(But the civilized way to build firm gums is IPANA and MASSAGE)

"RIDICULOUS," said a prominent matron. "No girl with a spark of intelligence or breeding would behave so badly. She'd be outlawed—every door closed to her!" That's the social side of the debate. But just for a moment listen to a modern dentist...

"Ridiculous?—not a bit of it. That's a very sensible picture. I'd be delighted to post it in my office as an object lesson for my patients. If more people chewed as vigorously, if modern teeth and gums were on better terms with coarse, rough, natural foods we'd hear a lot less about tender, rundown gums—we'd hear a whole lot less about 'pink tooth brush,' too."

"Pink Tooth Brush" is serious

When you see "pink tooth brush"—see your dentist. It can mean serious trouble. But usually it simply means that modern soft foods haven't given your gums enough work—that they need the healthful stimulation of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage.

Ipana plus massage is a part of modern dental practice because Ipana is especially designed to benefit the gums as well as clean the teeth. Get a tube of Ipana today and begin this modern health routine. Massage your gums every time you brush your teeth. Circulation quickens. Your gums feel healthier. And your teeth grow whiter, show more sparkle.

Help your dentist to keep you from being a "dental cripple." Don't let your tooth brush show "pink." Don't let yourself in for the really serious gum troubles. Firm gums and shining white teeth are vitally important to you. Switch to Ipana Tooth Paste and massage—and switch today!

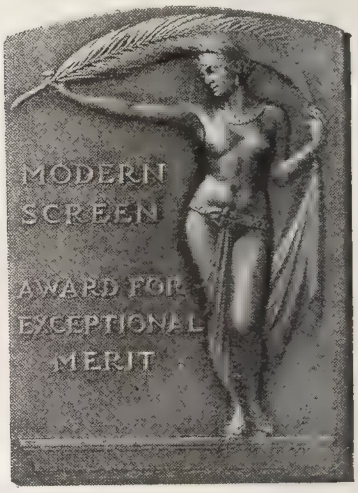
Cecil B. DeMille, director, and Gary Cooper, star of "The Plainsman" accept the Award of Merit from Leo Townsend, Hollywood Editor of Modern Screen.

WE SALUTE "The Plainsman"



Our congratulations to everyone who helped make "The Plainsman" a fine and moving spectacle, a dramatic and colorful picture of America when it was young.

Cecil B. DeMille, who produced and directed the picture for Paramount, caps a quarter of a century of making movies. Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur, in the leads, as well as the supporting players, contribute to the entertainment with highly commendable performances.

Each month Modern Screen will award a medal to the most outstanding about-to-be-released production. Our Award of Merit is given, after careful consideration, to the picture we feel will offer you the most entertainment, the picture you'll most want to see. Let Modern Screen be your guide to good pictures, and watch for next month's Award of Merit.

Deviating from his allegiance to biblical times, producer-director Cecil B. DeMille turns his attention and his cameras to that period in American history when Buffalo Bill and Wild Bill Hickok roamed the plains. With the DeMille touch in evidence throughout, "The Plainsman" is an exciting slice of Early America. It has the color and the pace of a glorified western plus the power and the epic sweep expected of a DeMille production. Around such historical events in American history as the Indian massacres and Custer's Last Stand, Mr. DeMille has woven a story of the heroism of Wild Bill Hickok and Buffalo Bill and the frustrated love of Calamity Jane. Briefly, the plot concerns the activities of John Lattimer, a rifle-running renegade (Charles Bickford) who sells guns and ammunition to the Indians. Wild Bill Hickok (Gary Cooper), determined to curtail the gun smuggling, is assigned by General Custer (John Miljan) to head off a band of Indians who are attempting to capture one of Custer's ammunition trains. With the aid of Buffalo Bill (James Ellison) he holds off the redskins until the arrival of Custer and his men, after which he sets out to find the rifle-runner. In the meantime, Custer and his troops are wiped out by a fresh attack from the Indians. Hickok gets his revenge when he meets Lattimer in a saloon owned by Calamity Jane (Jean Arthur) and beats him to the draw. A few minutes later Wild Bill's career is ended when he's shot in the back by a bartender.

Gary Cooper plays Wild Bill in a manner reminiscent of his excellent similar role in "The Virginian;" Jean Arthur's Calamity Jane will add considerably to her growing reputation and James Ellison's Buffalo Bill proves him one of the most adept of the screen's younger players. In the supporting cast, Charles Bickford, John Miljan, Porter Hall and a newcomer, Helen Burgess, are outstanding. Don't miss this picture

Like a thunderbolt of naked light, "Winterset" struck Broadway! Youth's impassioned cry for love, rising out of a great city's sound and fury!...Crowded audiences sat enthralled by its swift, burning drama. For months, they warmed their hearts in its deep-glowing romance ..."Winterset" won the Critics' Award as the best play produced in New York last season. Now, with the three exciting stars who made it a stage sensation, it tears at your heart on the screen.

SLATED FOR SUCCESS

They're not stars yet but—just watch them!

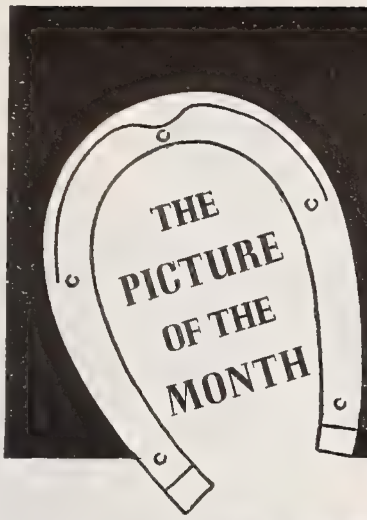
Elizabeth Russell is one of Paramount's fair-haired darlings. She came to the screen via the model route and will be seen in "Hideaway Girl."

Right, Robert Kent won the much-coveted role in the Quints' next picture, "Reunion." He plays opposite pretty Rochelle Hudson.

Below, here's a beau-about-town and one of Twentieth Century-Fox's bright hopes, Tony Martin. Tony will be seen in "Banjo on My Knee."

Warners gave Jeanne Madden one of those Cinderella breaks by letting her co-star with Dick Powell in "Stage Struck" for her debut.

Over at Universal they plan big things some day for Jeanne Dante, below. She's a vivacious youngster. See her in "Four Days' Wonder."



THE PICTURE OF THE MONTH

WINNER OF THE LAUGH SWEEPSTAKES!

Thanks to the inspired "Oiwin" of that bewildered young man, Frank McHugh, "THREE MEN ON A HORSE" is both the picture of the month and the farce of the year! Take our tip and be in the grandstand when it romps into town!

'Oiwin' had two great passions—poems and ponies. But when his tearful bride faced him with a notebook filled with strange feminine names and numbers 'Oiwin' became an "also ran!"

The "mob" discovered 'Oiwin' and found a walking gold mine. His penchant for picking ponies made paupers out of bookies but millions for the mob!

"Oiwin, you're the first guy to really prove that man's best friend is the horse."

"It's the horse that deserves the credit—all I did was pick him—he had to go to the trouble of running."

When his bride found out that the names in the notebook weren't pretties but ponies—all was forgiven—and 'Oiwin' forgot about races and went back to rhymes. It's the big cheek-to-cheek finish of the Laugh Sweepstakes of the year!

"3 MEN ON A HORSE"

"Three Men On a Horse," the sensational stage success is in its second big year on Broadway and still going strong! The greatest comedy hit in 10 years played by 6 companies in 4 countries to capacity crowds!

ALL WORK AND NO PLAY

Right, Miss S. Temple looks the fairway over for a likely spot to tee off. This is one of the ways in which she relaxes after a day's busy work in "Stowaway."

Left, the racket looks almost as big as the girl, but Sybil Jason has a lot of fun just batting balls back and forth. She's in "The Making of O'Malley."

Left, Jane Withers' hobby is animals—her menagerie includes a cat, two dogs, two rabbits, a monkey, goldfish and a turtle. See her in "Can This Be Dixie?"

As for Virginia Weidler, right, she can't be separated from her pet scooter even during studio hours! Here she is "scooting" to the "Our Miss Keane" set.

A day off! And Edith Fellows gets into slacks and sweater for fun at a nearby amusement park. A pony ride is her idea of fun. She's in "Pennies from Heaven."

Doris Nolan divides her time between the stage and screen. And left, you see her in a scene from "The Man I Marry," with Michael Whalen.

Heartbreak and tears played no part in Doris Nolan's rise to fame

By Dorothy Herzog

MAYBE IT WAS TOO EASY!

MAYBE IT was too easy!"

So said Doris Nolan, twenty-year-old featured player. No grim, hard struggle to get into motion pictures for this youngster. Not even any difficulty to get a featured player foothold in the New York theatre.

"It just seemed to open up for me in both pictures and the stage," Doris remarked over a cautious luncheon. The luncheon consisted of a pineapple and cream cheese salad and coffee with one lump of sugar, but no cream. "Yes," Doris admitted to our question if she were dieting, "I'm on a diet," and she smiled, revealing two very engaging dimples.

"How much do you weigh?" She appeared a very slender five foot five.

"A hundred and eighteen, but I want to keep down to that. You see, on the picture"—her current release, "The Man I Marry"—"I had quite a stretch of water scenes. I got soaked to the skin for days and it brought on laryngitis. I was pretty sick for a time, and worked every day. So they gave me egg-nogs to keep me going —I couldn't eat anything—and you know how rich egg-nog is. Now I'm back on my diet."

"Have you ever gone in for the Hollywood diets—that four-day one that's the new craze, for instance?"

"No. I don't like to feel self-conscious about dieting. It makes me irritable, although it doesn't seem to affect most people like that. Clark Gable lost twelve pounds on that four-day diet. But I just keep to salads and lamb chops and stay away from sweets. It's no hardship."

"Do you exercise, too?"

"I love horseback riding and mountain climbing. When I'm in New York I walk around the reservoir about four times every day or so for exercise—even in winter." She laughed. "That's when I started to wear flannels, but you really have to, for the wind comes tearing around that reservoir and cuts clean through you."

We returned to her career.

"Maybe it was too easy," she repeated, "and then again, maybe not. I'm glad it wasn't too hard anyway, because when a career comes with too much difficulty it seems to make one a little bitter against the profession one's trying to get into. Hollywood isn't the easiest place in the world. They either ignore you or try to spoil you, but I like it," and she laughed.

She's very young, this Doris Nolan, even for twenty. She's young in a healthy, buoyant but not at all obnoxious way. She's young in her keen appreciation of life that has been most generous and kind to her. But she's a well-poised young lady with a sense of humor that enables her to laugh at herself, as well as at less personal affairs.

"Did Hollywood try to make you over?" we asked, knowing this little trick of the film capital.

She nodded, dimpling into a smile. "Oh, yes, and I like that, too."

"How did they make you over?"

She doesn't appear to require outside help. She has rather gay, though moody, brown eyes; a small nose; sensitive lips; light brown hair cut in a longish, wavy bob; long eyelashes generously (Continued on page 92)

THE INCIDENTAL

Frank McHugh takes Joan Blondell and Carol Hughes for a ride in "Three Men on a Horse"—the screen version of the popular play that enjoyed a three-year run on the New York stage. His role in this bright comedy is undoubtedly Frank's best to date.

Incidentally, the irrepressible McHugh has worked out an unique philosophy which will both inspire and amuse you.

FRANK McHUGH doesn't want to be a star—and six years of concerted effort to prevent such a catastrophe has proven that he is still of the same frame of mind.

You see, the ambition of almost every picture player is to rate top billing, but, as we've said, that's not Frank's problem. He is satisfied to remain the incidental guy at his studio. Perhaps you think that this indicates a self-satisfied or lazy attitude. But just stop to analyze why McHugh hesitates to enter the envied ranks of the great.

Frank says, "I play whatever they give me, and hope for the best. The actors can all fight about roles if they like, but to me it's just like butting your head against a stone wall, so why get excited?"

The screen's most famous portrayer of pificated gents has some of the best reasons you'll find in a day's march for his complacent attitude toward his movie career. And, practically born in the theatre and an actor for the past thirty years, he certainly should be in the know.

"You see, all my family are actors," McHugh began. "I was actually raised behind the footlights. There is hardly an aspect of the theatre and acting that I don't know about from experience. So, when I see players fighting with studios, I wonder why and for what."

At first McHugh scored in movies because

GUY

By Robert McIlwaine

The star may take the bows, but Frank McHugh claims the featured player has his big moments, too of the humorous and witty manner in which he enacted a drunk. So successful was he in this role that he soon became known as the funny drunk. The part has practically typed Frank, but he doesn't seem to care a hang. In fact, he is almost glad that he is allowed the privilege of playing it, for he can do more or less as he pleases in the development of the character he is to create.

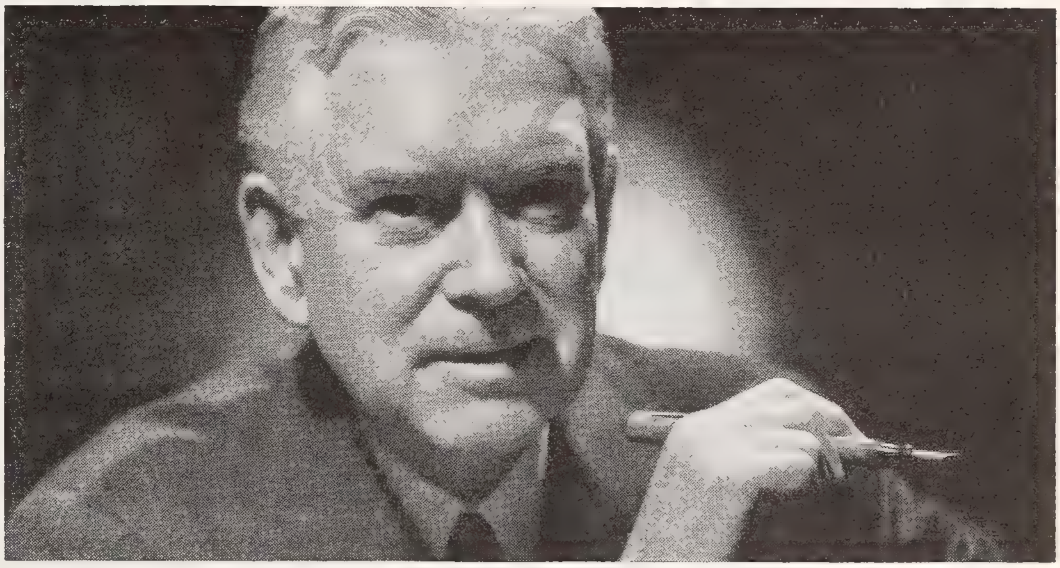
In fact, he expressed his sentiments with, "They can all have the star parts; just give me a featured role and I'll be satisfied. You see, then what I do, isn't too important to the story, so I can interpret the character in any way I see fit. Even if I change the lines around, the change isn't too vital to the story.

"But with the star, it's another matter. He has to play a role as it's written, because, if he switches his dialogue it affects the plot. You know the action is usually built around the star. But I'm just incidental to the plot and so have a lot more fun making my role grow as I go along."

Frank McHugh doesn't worry about the pictures that he thought were poor; (Continued on page 99)

Let the doctor's judgment guide you in your choice of a laxative



YOUR doctor is a guardian of health. He knows that many things that seem unimportant to you may be vital to your well-being.

For instance, doctors expect a laxative to measure up to certain definite standards before giving it their approval. If your doctor would write down his requirements for a laxative, these are the points he would consider important:

WHAT DOCTORS LOOK FOR IN A LAXATIVE

It should be dependable.
It should be mild and gentle.
It should be thorough.
Its merit should be proven by the test of time.
It should not form a habit.
It should not over-act.
It should not cause stomach pains.
It should not nauseate, or upset digestion.

EX-LAX CHECKS ON EVERY POINT

Ex-Lax meets the doctor's demands. Meets them so completely that many doctors use Ex-Lax for themselves and for their own families.

For over 30 years mothers have been giving Ex-Lax to their children with perfect confidence. Today, Ex-Lax numbers its users in the millions. They have made it the largest-selling laxative in the whole, wide world.

ONE TRIAL WILL CONVINCE YOU

Try Ex-Lax. Prove to yourself how fine a laxative it is. Ex-Lax is not disturbing or upsetting. Ex-Lax does not over-act. It does not "force" or cause stomach pains. Ex-Lax is mild and gentle. Ex-Lax is thoroughly effective. Ex-Lax is particularly kind to the delicate systems of children. They need this type of laxative as much as you do—or even more.

THE TASTE IS DELIGHTFUL

Try Ex-Lax for a pleasant change from nasty, bitter medicines. Ex-Lax tastes just like delicious chocolate. Children like it, of course, and take it without resistance. . . . All drug stores have Ex-Lax in 10c and 25c sizes. If you prefer to try Ex-Lax at our expense, mail the coupon below.

Just about as fast as Ginger can tap out a new dance, she can get a meal together on cook's night out. Right, you see one of the Rogers "quickie" dishes. It's the Rogers Supper Ring made of a delicious combination of many familiar and popular foods.

SWING INTO it, sister, we're going to study the "quickies." Of course, if you're up on your Hollywood terminology you know that that word is used to describe pictures which are turned out by the studios at a minimum of time and expense—in a period of weeks instead of months and with the cost cut down to almost nothing. But those aren't the sort of "quickies" I'm referring to here since this is, by and large, a cooking article. Besides, our bright and particular guest star on this occasion is Ginger Rogers, whose name these days is associated only with the most lavish productions and the most colossal successes! So I'll set your mind at rest by telling you that the "quickies" I'm about to describe for you—and in which Ginger is pleased to appear, just this once, for our especial benefit — are those last minute, hastily assembled, easily prepared meals which all too frequently, alas, are sacrificed on the altar of speed.

Yet, with a little serious thought and some well applied effort these repasts can be truly delicious. And Ginger is the one to prove it; for what culinary talents she possesses shine forth in the preparation of just such meals as these.

"I'm only a Thursday-night cook, but a good one," declared Miss Rogers. "And even at that there aren't many Thursday nights when I go domestic," she assured me laughingly. "But when I do, the pots fly, the dishes rattle and the neighbors wonder at the din. While Mother stands by to assure an anxious world that it's only little Ginger gently puttering around in the kitchen, throwing together one of those quarter-of-an-hour meals for which, she declares, I should be famous! So if you are looking for soup and pot roast recipes or fruit cake and the like —things that take hours to simmer, or boil, or bake— don't come to me. No, I'm only able to suggest ways to fix up a meal in jig-time. Why, I watch the clock like a radio announcer and after fifteen minutes my cooking program must be 'off the air' and on the table, or else!"

"Or else what?" I wanted to know.

"Or else I sincerely wish I'd gone to the Trocadero along with the rest of Hollywood!

"You see," she continued, "Thursday night is cook's night out in Beverly Hills, on Outpost Drive, at Santa Monica Beach, just as it is on Park Avenue or Michigan Boulevard. So everybody dons their best duds and out they go for dinner. But sometimes I'm just too tired to bother, and fixing a meal—especially the kind I prepare—

Ginger Rogers puts a jiffy tempo into her cooking routine. Here's how she does it seems like much less effort than would be more dressing, more hair-fixing and more dancing after a day at the studio devoted to those very things. And that day probably started at seven with a make-up man and coiffeuse working over me as I breakfasted and ended at seven with one last exhausting pirouette! Then, 'nothing to do till tomorrow' except lines to learn and a dance step to practice! Gracious, where do people get the idea that it's all play and no work, this business of being a star! Yes, there are many times when you're just too exhausted to face the music and dance, when home and slacks and a pair of old bedroom slippers have more appeal than the most exciting date. And if that happens to occur on a Thursday then some real thought must be given to food. So here in Hollywood, as elsewhere, the familiar words are heard, 'What will we have for dinner?' "

Just fifteen minutes is the time Ginger gives to a food "workout!"

Then Ginger went on to describe some of the ways in which she solves this

P. S. Print my letter if you like, but don't print my name.

My daughter, Joan, loves parties. She has plenty of friends too. But she never used to invite them into her home. One day I asked her if she was ashamed of it.

After I coaxed her, she broke down and told me that the girls at school joked a lot about "tattle-tale gray." And Joan was afraid her friends would notice that my linens and things had it bad.

I was plenty mad because I work hard. But Joan showed me one of your ads about how the wrong kind of soap gives clothes "tattle-tale gray" by leaving dirt stuck in the clothes.

So just to please her I changed and tried Fels-Naptha Soap. And my, the difference it's made! All that gentle naptha along with that wonderful golden soap wash so clean. I've never had my things look so white!

"YOUR AUTOGRAPH,

A fan tells you his varied experiences in collecting famous stars' signatures

It wasn't the "getting" of Loretta Young's autograph that made it valuable. But—guess what?

"Out of my way, Son," said Mae West. But did our collector, his mind made up, obey?

I'VE OFTEN wondered what Clark Gable, Norma Shearer and Wally Beery thought of me when I asked for their autographs. Did they consider me a nit-wit for waiting hours for the privilege of getting them to place their signatures in a book of mine? Were they flattered, even to a small degree, because I asked for their written names as a keepsake, or did they feel that my request for their autographs was just an excuse on my part to accost them in person?

I doubt if I'll ever have this, and many similar questions, answered truthfully. But of this I am sure—my own reactions towards the many motion picture stars whose autographs I now possess. And nothing can take away the variety of experiences I went through to get these signatures, experiences that gave me an entirely different set of impressions about the various film stars as compared to the ones I had gained by watching them on the screen.

For instance, my favorite actor on the screen had always been Jack Oakie. Yet, when I asked Jack Oakie for his autograph, one day in front of the Trocadero Cafe, that comedian none too gently placed his fist in the middle of my face and shoved me down several stairs. I never could get up much enthusiasm where John Boles was concerned, but his reception of the same request was considerably different. He not only signed my book, but after doing so bowed very politely and, with genuine pleasure written all over his handsome face, thanked me with a smile. He made me feel as if I were doing him a favor; not that he was doing one for me.

A gentleman of almost identical calibre was Oliver Hardy. Incidentally, off-screen, Hardy presents an immaculately groomed contrast to the rather shabbily attired, rotund comedian who makes Stan Laurel turn loose his excruciatingly funny cry-baby act. When asked to sign my book, as he was entering his golf clubhouse, Oliver Hardy stopped, smiled at me, carefully cleaned his glasses, then picked up my book and wrote, "With best wishes,

PLEASE?"

By Herbert L. Strock

Oliver Hardy." As I thanked him he countered with a pleasant, "It was a pleasure, I assure you."

Just as John Boles and Oliver Hardy are perfect gentlemen, so is Jean Muir a thorough lady—even under trying circumstances. She proved it recently, when a mob of about fifty autograph seekers "ganged up" on her in front of a Beverly Hills theatre. Completely disregarding the fact that they were practically tearing her apart, she took her time and calmly signed each person's book in turn, until everybody was satisfied. If that isn't playing the martyr to your public, I don't know what is.

Of all my "No" stars, Myrna Loy is the favorite. When asked to sign my book she refused, telling me she was in a hurry. But I wouldn't take "No" for an answer. I kept right alongside her as she started to walk away, and persisted in my request for her signature. It looked almost hopeless, because no matter how much I refused to take "No" for an answer, that was all I got—for a few minutes. Then she said, "Maybe later." It was her first sign of weakness, and it made me chuckle. She heard it, (Continued on page 108)

You'd guess John Boles to be agreeable, wouldn't you? Well, you're right.

YES, IF YOUR MAKE-UP'S NATURAL

WHAT IS BEAUTY FOR—if not to set masculine hearts athrob—if not to bring the thrill of conquests—if not to sing little songs of happiness in your heart when he admires? Make-up's so important—especially your rouge!

There's nothing beautiful about rouge that looks painted, that outlines itself as a splotch. But Princess Pat rouge—duo-tone—Ah, there is beauty!

All over the world smartly-groomed women say Princess Pat rouge is their favorite. Let's discover its secret of utterly natural color. Your rouge—unless it is Princess Pat—most likely is one flat tone. But Princess Pat rouge is duo-tone.

There's an undertone that blends with an overtone, to change magically on your skin. It becomes richly beautiful, vital, real—no outline. The almost incredible, astounding effect is that of color coming from within the skin, just like a natural blush. You'll be a glamorous person with Princess Pat rouge—irresistible. Try it—and see.

FREDRIC MARCH: If, in 1920, a fortune teller had predicted that Fredric March would be an actor, no one would have been more surprised than Fredric himself. He was 22 years old at the time and already launched on a promising career. Born in Racine, Wisconsin, on the 31st of August, 1898, he graduated from the university of that state, after winning his numerals in football and track and being elected president of the senior class. While at college he had been granted one of the National City Bank scholarships and was hard at work soon after graduation, with an interesting future ahead. But the bank changed presidents and Freddy was afraid they might change scholarships, too, so he asked for a leave of absence and got a job as third assistant stage manager on a Belasco production. He never went back to the bank. Numerous stock company successes were followed by important Broadway roles, and before very long his name got to be known in Hollywood. But Fredric wasn't interested—not until the advent of talking pictures. Since 1928, when he made his first picture for Paramount, "The Dummy," he has created one vivid screen characterization after the other, and in 1932 his efforts were crowned by the Academy Award for his performance in "Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." You might guess that Fred has brown hair and brown eyes. He is five feet 11 inches tall and weighs 170 pounds. If you are a good friend of his, you are very likely to play lots of tennis with Fred and go on long horseback jaunts. He is happily married to Florence Eldridge and has adopted two children. His next starring picture will be "Saint in New York."

LISELOTTE BORCHMEYER, Milwaukee, Wisconsin—No, Dick Powell is not going to live in his Toluca Lake home with his new bride. He and Joan moved into their ritzy Beverly Hills mansion before starting out on their honeymoon.

FRANCHOT TONE: The fact that Franchot was born in the honeymooner's town of Niagara Falls doesn't seem to have made him especially marriage conscious. He's only married once and is still very much in love with his wife, Joan Crawford. But that's getting ahead of the story. Franchot's father is an important business executive. He is not an only child, since he has one brother who is four years his senior. When it comes to "book larnin," it is hard to find Tone's equal in Hollywood. His prep-school education was completed at the Hill School of Pottsdam, Pa. His college alma-mater is Cornell. After three years there, he attended a summer session at the University of Ronnes in France, was president of the Cornell Dramatic Club while there, and returned to Ithaca to serve as an assistant to the head of the Romance Languge Department. His introduction to the stage was via the accepted stock-company route. From a Buffalo stock company to Broadway is quite a hop, but Franchot made it in his stride and before very long found himself playing an important role in the Group Theatre's box-office sensation, "Success Story." It proved to be the beginning of his own success story. M-G-M heard of the brilliant young Broadwayite and wanted him to sign a long-term contract. He signed. And then in his first picture, "Today We Live," he met Joan Crawford. Sorta makes you believe in Fate, doesn't it? Franchot is a real golf and swimming fan—not the type that sits on the sidelines, either. Believe it or not, his idea of recreation is to see a good movie. He is six feet tall, weighs 160 pounds and has light brown hair and hazel eyes. You can see him now in "Love on the Run" with the old team of Crawford and Gable, to be followed by "Quality Street" with Katharine Hepburn.

KATHRYN FERGUSON, Dallas, Texas—Very few of the stars in the Hollywood firmament have the time to read their fan mail. Sometimes the truth is disappointing, isn't it? Whether he reads it or not, Bob Taylor gets more mail than any of the stars of his sex.

JEAN PARKER: The girl paints; she dances; she loves music; she mothers dogs, kittens, rabbits—not to mention her pet monkeys; her favorite play is Barrie's "Peter Pan." There you have Jean Parker in a nut-shell . . . aesthetic, loving, imaginative. And, with a sort of poetic justice, Destiny smoothed her path to stardom, gave her a career without the usual fierce prelude of struggle and disappointed ambitions. A movie executive saw her ride past in a float in the Pasadena Tournament of Roses. He saw and she conquered. She was hired almost immediately and began her screen career with an important part in "Divorce in the Family." Her first leading role was in "What Price Innocence?" Jean, whose real name is Mae Green, was born in Deer Lodge, Montana. Her father was a designer and the prizes that she has won in that field of endeavor mark her out as pretty much of a chip off the old block. She has brown hair and dreamy hazel eyes, weighs 109 pounds, and is all of 5 feet 3 inches tall. Jean was recently married to Newspaperman George McDonald. Her last picture was "The Texas Rangers" with Fred MacMurray and Jack Oakie.

THELMA DUBROVNIK, Grand Rapids, Mich.—James and Lucille Gleason recently celebrated their silver wedding anniversary. Quite a record these days, 'specially in Hollywood where that sort of thing is frowned on.

ALICE FAYE: The temperament with which Alice Faye sings or rather swings her songs bespeaks a metropolitan background. It ought to, because it was Manhattan which bore her, Manhattan's schools which educated her, and Manhattan's Broadway which gave roots to her talent. And don't get the idea that she's forgotten her debt. A vacation to Alice Faye, when she's been slaving away out on the coast, means nothing more or less than a trip back to good old Gotham. Alice has one other great debt. That's to Rudy Vallee. You see, Alice was just a chorus girl. Popular—yes, and lots of engagements, too . . . now at the Hollywood, now at the Palais d'Or, and then in the chorus of George White's "Scandals." But, to speak the truth, she wasn't getting ahead too rapidly—not until a 25c home record and the generosity of Rudy Vallee entirely changed the course of her star. It seems that she was taking singing lessons and a friend of hers who knew Rudy wanted her to have an audition. Nothing doing, said Alice, she wasn't going to make a fool of herself. So the friend suggested singing into a record instead of the more conventional personal hearing. Alice took him up. Rudy was so impressed by the canned audition he gave Alice her first big-time job, featured singer with the Connecticut Yankees. The rest of the story you know. Twentieth Century-Fox starred her in the movie version of George White's "Scandals" and, since that time, the petite blonde, blue-eyed vocalist has been going places. In her latest hit, "Sing Baby Sing," she was co-starred with Adolphe Menjou. She is now scheduled to do "On the Avenue" with the newlywed Dick Powell.

MARY WILSON, Hope, Arkansas—Modern Screen had a Loretta Young cover in April, 1931; Miriam Hopkins in March, 1934; and Margaret Sullavan in February, 1935. You can get these issues by specifying their date and mailing ten cents for each copy to our Subscription Department, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. Sorry, but we have never run a Robert Taylor cover.

JAMES ELLISON: Yes, his name is Smith. And that isn't just the story he tells the cops, either. Born James Ellison Smith at Valier, Montana, he dropped the Smith to go on the stage. James Ellison isn't one of those slick fellows who gets into the movies by accident or just because he is 6 feet 3 inches tall and awfully good looking. He preferred to make his entrance "legitimately," gradually earning a reputation for himself by his numerous artistically interpreted roles at the Pasadena Community Playhouse. The next stop on the Ellison itinerary to glory was a part in Billie Burke's "Vinegar Tree," with which production he toured the country. Later he appeared with Laura Hope Crews in "As Husbands Go" and with Frances Starr in "What Every Woman Knows." His successes on the road were followed by three more years of serious study in the field of dramatics. Then, because the wolf had to be kept away from the door somehow, he accepted a laboratory job at Warner Brothers. A subsequent screen test was successful and James found himself "in the movies." But not really IN them . . . not until Paramount cast him with Bill Boyd in the "Hopalong Cassidy" series. This proved an important break, since his hard riding and sincere acting in this series was quite good enough to convince Cecil B. DeMille that here was the man he needed to play Buffalo Bill in his production of "The Plainsman," starring Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur. Good luck, James Ellison, and let's hope this is only the beginning of your career.

PHILOMENA BONELLI, Trenton, N. J.—Robert Taylor loses a night's sleep if a black cat crosses his path . . . but it has to be a full grown cat . . . a kitten doesn't worry him in the least.

J. D. W., Salina, Kansas—You'll be seeing Zasu Pitts pretty soon in "The Riddle of the Dangling Pearl." Neil Hamilton isn't so very busy right now. Too bad. Last year he played in "Fugitive Lady," "The Daring Young Man," and "Mutiny Ahead."

FRED MacMURRAY: Jack of all trades and master of quite a few is Fred. If he weren't acting he could be singing, and if he weren't singing, he could be tooting a mean sax. Or if none of these opportunities were open to him, you can be sure that Jack Curley would be billing this rangy 6 foot 3 fellow as "Man Mountain" MacMurray, or, in view of his feminine appeal, as the "Wisconsin Adonis." Fred began life on the road. His dad, violinist Fred MacMurray, was on a concert tour with his wife, when young Fred Junior was born in Kankakee, Illinois. The family later removed to Wisconsin where Fred was educated. After a year at college Fred got on his high horse and said he'd had enough. He could afford to be independent. Without any trouble at all he nailed a saxophonist's job in Chicago. His luck repeated in Los Angeles where he arrived just in time to fill a vacancy in Warner's Hollywood Theatre. And before long he not only played but was featured as vocal soloist. For Fred had a voice. The voice took him places that the sax wouldn't have. In 1929 Fred was booked in "Three's a Crowd," in which he was featured in a singing sketch with Libby Holman. For five years, Fred, as soloist of the California Collegians, was a popular figure in all New York's hot spots. When the band was featured in Max Gordon's hit, "Roberta," Fred was chosen to understudy

NEW COLOR—"NEW" DRESS
Only you and Rit will know it's an old dress—your mirror will say it's lovely today!

FADED LINGERIE SPARKLES
Tint underthings quickly and beautifully, with Rit colors that resist washing!

FRESH TONES FOR HOSIERY
Save odd stockings by matching their color with Rit... or revive faded hose with new shades.

GLOWING TABLE LINEN
Rit makes luncheon and bridge linens so gay and festive. You can change them at will.

SMARTLY COLORED BED LINEN
Spreads, sheets and pillow cases can have the loveliest shades—and still launder beautifully!

TO FRESHEN CURTAINS
French Ecru Rit gives curtains the sunniest color that never seems to wash out! Not a "surface color" that has to be renewed each time!

Never say "Dye"—say RIT!

• Rit has changed home dyeing unbelievably! A patented penetrating agent in Rit (found in no other tint or dye) causes the color to set evenly, quickly, through-and-through every thread—without fear of streaks and spots. Amazingly different from the muss, the dreariness and the uncertainty of old-fashioned dyeing.

Rit's cost is a matter of pennies—its value means many dollars to you. Just be sure you get Rit—and not an ordinary tint or dye.

• Dissolves instantly! Rit is a powder wafer—easier to measure, won't sift out of the package like loose powder dyes. Not a soap!

• A single drop of any ordinary dye, on dry material, can't get past the oil-coated fibres—remains a drop on the surface like a dew-drop on a leaf—requires boiling to make it penetrate the fabric.

• Rit (which contains a patented penetrating ingredient) soaks in as soon as it hits the fabric like a drop of ink on blotting paper. Rit is the only household dye with this feature! It does not require boiling to make it penetrate.

ONLY RIT GIVES FAST COLORS WITHOUT BOILING

HURRAY!! I'VE STRUCK OIL!

"Just wait till you discover this Oil Rub used by almost all hospitals"

"Gosh, how I used to be scared of germs. But now . . . what do you think . . . the germs are scared of me! Isn't that wonderful? Well . . . it's because I struck oil. Yes—my mother now gives me a body rub every day with Mennen Antiseptic Oil; so I've always got a film of safety over me that keeps away the germs and stops infection. The other day I heard our doctor say that almost all hospitals* now give their babies the daily protection of Mennen Antiseptic Oil. It keeps us so much safer and healthier. Gee, I'm glad my mother's up-to-date and knows about important things like this."

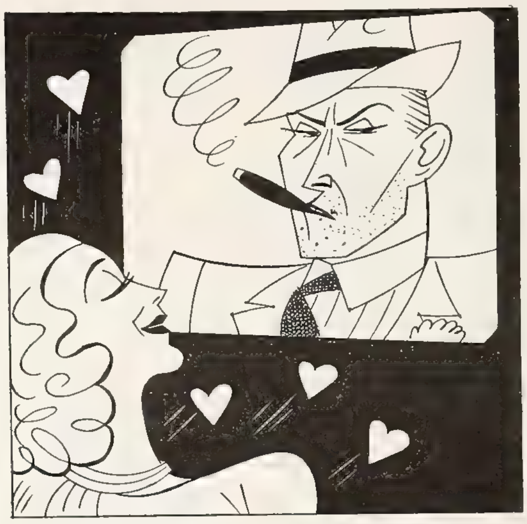
Disappointed

Recently I saw "Anthony Adverse." I had been acquainted with the voluminous novel by Hervey Allen, the sensitiveness of imagination, the exquisite prose, the stimulating characterizations. Like many others I awaited the release of this unusual screen endeavor with something of misgiving, lest the story, due to its immensity, be impaired. Newspapers assured the public that the novel had not suffered, that the film was lengthy, gigantic, to say the least, but more than adequate, that its treatment had been delicate and that the full flavor of the book had been preserved. Hervey Allen gave the film its most potent attraction among the readers of this nation when he declared his approval without reservation.



What's the matter with our leading men, queries a Washington gal. She doesn't leave the question unanswered either.

So, eagerly I, too, hastened to see the valiant Anthony relive again in part the inevitable misery that was his birthright. But this was not the Anthony I knew, nor the Angela, nor the Faith. They were not the beings of vast emotions written into them. And the Madonna—how ineffectual and devoid of the spiritual solace she rendered Anthony.

My disappointment in this huge episodic rendition of "Anthony Adverse" I do not attribute to the producers, for the screen has its limitations, nor to its advertisement in the superlative, for I am not susceptible to the racket that accompanies forthcoming productions, but rather to the vigorous consent with which Mr. Allen blessed the film.—Lee Hosford, Jersey City, N. J.

An Open Letter to Bob Taylor

I think you should treat your fan mail with a little more consideration, because if you don't you are sure to lose many of your fans. After seeing you in "Small Town Girl," I wrote you a letter. I never received a reply. In fact I wrote you three letters which were unanswered. For your birthday I sent you a lovely card and you didn't even thank me for it. Do you think you should treat your fans like this? Perhaps your secretary didn't give you the letters and card, if so then you have an excuse, but if she did and you just cast them away you're not worth going to see. Just put yourself in my place and see how it feels not to hear from someone you're fond of.—Lola Day, San Jose, Calif.

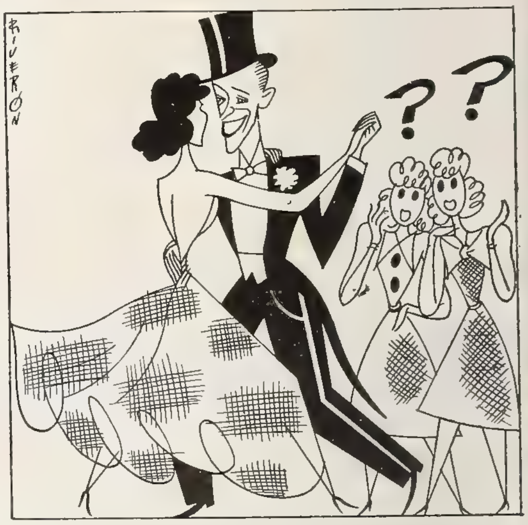
Are Leading Men Too Nice?

Remember when Clark Gable took a couple of wallops at Norma Shearer and Jean Harlow and we liked it so very well we hailed him as a great actor? Remember when James Cagney treated the ladies in cave-man fashion and we thought it was swell?

Isn't that one reason we so admire Fredric March? Even if he doesn't actually hit a lady he has a fire in his eye which glints and tells you he might strike her if he thought she needed it.



Do you agree with the gent from Massachusetts, who claims that Jessie Matthews is the Queen of Dancing?

All of which makes me wonder: Aren't the leading men of today rather effeminate? Robert Taylor is a very nice chap. So is—well, most of the new crop. But they aren't what I'd call regular brawny he-men. They make me think too much of the dapper Louis XIV and his court. Even Clark Gable seems to have lost his mortgage on the slap-'em-down policy. I'll take Wallace Beery any old day. He looks like he could put away a dish of corned-beef and cabbage and then go out and get up a good alley brawl. He may not be handsome, but he's no sissy at least! K. B., Seattle, Washington.

But when you ask who's the queen of dancing, some will say Ginger Rogers, others will say Eleanor Powell, and some might even suggest Ruby Keeler. However, in my mind there's only one girl who can take that title without a question. Yes, it's that beautiful English beauty, Jessie Matthews. She's the Queen!

What a thrill if she and Fred Astaire will get together for a picture. I've seen everyone of her pictures from "Evergreen" to her most recent release "It's Love Again" and she has improved with each one. She's the greatest dancing star alive.—Kenneth F. Parker, Brookline, Mass.

There'll be little stepping like the above Rogers and Astaire duet in "Swing Time," if Mrs. R.'s dramatic plans for Ginger work out.

MOTHER KNOWS BEST

GINGER ROGERS "Don't Wanna Dance" much longer in her film productions and if the plans of her astute managing mother carry through, the peppy blonde star will switch her talents into cinema drama without benefit of terpsichore and lyric writers. Her contract still calls for one musical film a year with Fred Astaire, a combination that has been a box office record breaker, but Lela Rogers believes that the era of teaming dancers in musical romances has already reached its zenith and that the seasons, for this type of movie attraction, are already numbered. The opening wedge into the new plans for Ginger Rogers is "Mother Carey's Chickens," a costume film set in the Spanish-American war period in which Ginger neither dances nor resorts to light comedy.

In a few years, Mrs. Rogers believes her daughter will be well on the way to repeating, in serious roles, the popularity she created for herself as a dancing heroine. And in the Rogers combine, mother knows best for, while Ginger may be an admiral in the Texas Navy, an honor conferred on her when she visited the Texas Centennial, it is Lela who is captain of the Rogers' ship, a command she does not intend to relinquish. She candidly admits that her smart supervision of her daughter's career has built Ginger's camera efforts into a million-dollar movie business. To her it is important that the builder of such a successful financial investment remains the boss on important decisions.

Not since the days when Bebe Daniels' mother managed her pretty, talented daughter into the front rank of silent screen stars has this sort of mother-daughter asso-

TRUE LIFE STORY

Bob Taylor has played with many famous women stars and now he is with Garbo in "Camille."

Such adulation as is Bob's has not been given to any male star in years—yet he's unspoiled.

GABLE WASN'T spoiled by the terrific avalanche of popularity and fame that hit him," said Bob Taylor, "and why the heck should I be? There'll be far less excuse for me, if I go haywire and 'Hollywood,' than there would have been for Clark, if he had. He worked hard for several years before stardom hit him with a wallop between the eyes. He had known discouragement and set-backs. And then, when suddenly it did happen, as it hadn't happened to anyone, since the days of Valentino, it was a complete reversal for him. He might well have been excused if he had lost his head. But he never has; not for one moment.

"I on the other hand, haven't had to work for any length of time at all. I've never even had time to get discouraged. I haven't had any set-backs—yet. I've always had everything. My whole life has been one smooth, progressive pattern. And while this Hollywood 'fame' is by far the brightest and most spectacular of all the patches that have made up the pattern of my life still, it is also of a piece with the rest of it.

"By golly, if I get 'spoiled' someone should line me up against a wall and shoot me. I'll deserve it. If I can do half as well as Gable, I'll be okay. I have the most tremendous admiration, amounting to awe, for him."

While Bob was talking to me, perched upon a camera case the while—Mamo's strong hands were massaging the Taylor shoulder muscles. You remember Mamo, who played the beautiful native girl opposite Clark in "Mutiny on the Bounty"? I don't know what Mamo was doing on the set other than serving in the capacity of a masseuse. I didn't ask. Anyway, there she was, wearing slacks and giving Bob the Hawaiian version of the Swedish "works." Bob remarked that he didn't know how he'd ever done without her.

"I've told, in almost every interview I've given," Bob went on, as he jerked and jolted under Mamo's kneading hands, "about this last year and what it has meant to me, and how I've reacted to it, and so forth and so on. I've said that I don't think I'm spoiled, don't feel spoiled, hope I never will be. I've said that I feel, if anything, an increasing sense of responsibility, a sense of the gravity of the work itself and a need to keep my feet planted firmly, Gable-wise, on the ground.

"I've said that when I first came to the studio I was afraid of the stars. I was. I'd been a fan, you see, on the other side of the line. I'd believed that these people were compounds of moonlight and magic and probable madness—and not mere flesh and blood people like me.

"I'm not afraid of them now. I haven't said this, you might say it for me. With the exception of my awe of Gable, I've discovered that they are just human beings and swell, hard-working ones at that. I'm not even afraid of Garbo," Bob said, his gray eyes laughing. "No, not even after playing Armand to (Continued on page 80)

DOES A DIPLOMA

WHAT VALUE has a college education in Hollywood?

For years young university graduates and other young men and women, to whom a college education is an impossibility, have been asking that question, their eyes following the curve of the rainbow to the fabulous pot of gold which lies in the motion picture studios.

The answer is surprising, but true, and proved by long years of Hollywood experience. A college education has little or no value in Hollywood except, of course, in the technical departments of the studios, where trained engineers and architects and electricians have a very necessary place. With these exceptions, the individual, himself, not his university degree, is the important factor in his success.

Only a very few of the more popular stars have ever sat in a college classroom. Strangely enough, few of the successful writers for the screen have university degrees and only a small number of the ace directors have diplomas tucked away in their trunks. The top-notch actors, authors and directors are proud graduates of that

They went to college! Fredric March, Katharine Hepburn and Robert Taylor all boast college degrees. But theirs is a small number compared with the imposing list of successful, self-made stars who succeeded without a Phi Beta Kappa key and, in most cases, not even a high school diploma.

They graduated from the school of hard knocks! Pictured on this page, there are Janet Gaynor, Clark Gable and Jean Harlow. In the article itself you'll discover dozens of others in their class.

COUNT IN HOLLYWOOD?

well-known "college of hard knocks," the school which has no ribbon-tied diplomas, no June commencements, no honor societies.

Today there are many young men and women in Hollywood who would gladly exchange that once-prized and engraved diploma for four years of practical experience with people and life, instead of with books.

Johnny Mack Brown, for instance, rode into Hollywood on a diploma from the University of Alabama and his fame as an all-American football player. Where is Johnny today? He has slipped from leading roles in the major studios into the ranks of western serials. While Gary Cooper, who was punching cattle on a Montana ranch and struggling along as an extra in pictures during Johnny's years of university life, is rated as one of the head men of the screen.

Then there's Franchot Tone. Franchot is an honor graduate of Cornell University and a possessor of a Phi Beta Kappa key, the laurel wreath of scholarship. After several years in Hollywood (Continued on page 94)

WHAT'S AHEAD FOR NORMA SHEARER?

Norma's marriage had the rare combination of a man and woman who shared not only a mutual love, but an unusually successful business association.

By Eleanor Packer

Will this beloved star continue her career or seek

Norma would drop work at a moment's notice to go on a trip to benefit Irving's health. Here they are returning from one.

Irving Thalberg's great monument, the artistic "Romeo and Juliet", with Norma and Leslie Howard in the name roles.

DEATH, SUDDEN and tragic, has ended Hollywood's most beautiful love story, the story of Norma Shearer and Irving Thalberg.

For nine years, since the October day when they were married, Norma and Irving had known not only a perfect love, but also a complete companionship, which included both their personal and their professional lives. They were a man and a woman who loved and married and became the parents of two children. They were also a brilliant, genius-tinged producer and a successful actress who worked, dreamed and accomplished together.

Quietly, as he had lived, Irving Thalberg died, surrounded by the ones he loved. Norma Shearer knelt beside him during those last heart-breaking hours, as she had stood beside him during the happy and almost unbelievably successful years of their marriage. In the final hours of his life, his eyes met hers in the deep and wordless understanding which they have always known.

When Hollywood had recovered from its first stunned shock and grief at the death of the young executive who had given so much, even his life, to the motion picture industry, the thoughts of everyone turned to Norma and her future. One question was on the lips of all who knew her.

"What will Norma do with the years which lie before her?"

No one knows the answer to that question, not even Norma herself. She is too bewildered in her sorrow, too numbed by the loss of her young husband, even to think of the future except as a blank and empty void.

But Norma is a young and a very vital woman. Time heals even the deepest wounds. She has her two children, the six-year-old boy with the heritage of Irving Thalberg's name, the baby girl to whom were bequeathed Irving Thalberg's glowing, dark brown eyes. Some day Norma will gather up the broken threads and go on. There is no doubt of that. How she will rebuild her life, no one can predict now, so soon after its wreckage.

HOLLYWOOD IS, of course, filled with whispers and prophecies. A few of Norma's friends say that she will never make another picture, that her superb performance in "Romeo and Juliet" will mark her farewell to the screen. That would be a gloriously dramatic gesture, to say her farewell with Irving Thalberg in the masterpiece which they made together, she as the star, he as the producer—to end Hollywood's most beautiful romance with the greatest love story of literature.

Other friends insist that Norma's career will go on, that she will continue to make pictures, that she will use her work to help to fill the new loneliness of her life. Knowing Norma, I believe that she will return to the screen after a few months of retirement. She is too young and too energetic to be idle. Her children will fill part of her life, but not all of it. Work is a habit with her. She has been busy, active, interested in the world of the stage and screen since she was sixteen years old.

"I believe that every woman owes it to her husband and children to have outside interests. A woman, who has other activities, whatever they may be, is far more interesting to her family than the woman who is completely submerged in domesticity, who knows nothing beyond the four walls of her home," Norma told me only a short time ago.

With those beliefs, what would be more natural than that Norma should continue with the work which has been the most absorbing interest in her life, second only to her husband and children? She has grown up with motion pictures. She knows them, artistically and technically, as few women do. (Continued on page 97)

Frank Lloyd reads an amusing page in the script to the two stars, Claudette Colbert and Fred MacMurray

With Frank (Mutiny on the Bounty) Lloyd as producer-director, with your favorites, Claudette Colbert and Fred MacMurray, in the lead roles, Paramount's "Maid of Salem" sweeps before the cameras. Here are the first glimpses of this mighty picture of a love which braved the blazing fury of Colonial New England's witchcraft persecutions.

Jean Muir now knows that it pays to be good

Jean takes another step toward a screen comeback in "Once a Doctor."

STORMY PETREL

By Dora Albert

WHAT HAS happened to Jean Muir? A year ago she seemed one of the White Hopes of Hollywood. Young, ambitious and individual, she had forged ahead with breathless speed. She was put into one fine role after another—the betrayed girl in "Dr. Monica," the starring roles in "As the Earth Turns" and "Desirable," the eagerly-contested role of Helena in "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

And then suddenly, as though her career were indeed a midsummer night's dream, it was all over. For eight months she made no pictures at all. Finally she was loaned to Twentieth Century-Fox for a small role in "White Fang," the kind of part in which any bit player could have appeared.

Recently she completed "Draegerman Courage," a program picture, and she is now doing "Once a Doctor," where she is featured with Donald Woods and Dick Purcell.

These are the facts, but what is the story behind them? Why was Jean Muir raised to the glittery pinnacle of stardom and then thrust back into obscurity?

The story of Jean Muir is the story of a rebel—and the price she paid for her rebellion. It is the story of a girl who almost threw away a career because of her critical, superior attitude toward Hollywood and motion pictures.

Jean never used to be very popular in Hollywood, except with a few people who knew her well. The rest found her too destructive, too much of a lone wolf. For one thing she was too frank and didn't know when to keep her thoughts to herself.

"When I first came to Hollywood," she confessed to me, "I was constantly making enemies because I spoke my mind so freely. Within earshot of a scenario writer, I would complain bitterly that the story he had written was atrocious and had no more plot than a barrel of sour apples. I would explain what an impossible person a certain director was, and discover a glazed look coming into the eyes of the person to whom I was talking. Nine times out of ten she turned out to be the director's wife."

When Jean Muir was appearing in "Dr. Monica" with Kay Francis, who was supposed to be the star, Miss Muir said frankly, "My role is much better than yours, you know. Do you mind?"

When Katharine Hepburn, after her startling success in Hollywood, appeared in an ill-starred Broadway play called "The Lake," Jean went backstage to see Katie after the performance and blurted out, "Miss Hepburn, I admire your courage."

Katharine Hepburn realized the honesty behind the girl's bluntness, but there were other stars in Hollywood who didn't, and who hated Jean.

And there were executives who would cheerfully have slaughtered her for, instead of accepting their suggestions meekly as other newcomers did, she asked a thousand questions. She wanted to know the why and wherefore of everything. At other times she acted as if she knew more about their business than they did.

When Jean first came to Hollywood, her ideas were based on how things were done on the stage, and she rebelled against Hollywood's methods. Her first part was in a picture which Roy Del Ruth was directing, "Bureau of Missing Persons."

"In this scene," he told her, "you're supposed to sit on a bench reading a newspaper and crying."

Jean did her best to obey. But she was new to picture and very nervous. It seemed to the director that Jean wasn't crying enough. "Bring the menthol," he ordered.

Jean was horrified. She thought of her idols of the stage. Did they use menthol to make them cry? Of course not!

"I won't do it!" she sobbed. But in the end she did as she was told. And she was so bitterly humiliated at the idea that it had been necessary to resort to menthol that the tears, real ones this time, came streaking down her face, leaving little blotches on her make-up.

Though Warners, impressed by her talent, put her into the finest roles they could find for her, Jean Muir never was satisfied.

Sometimes, of course, Jean was right. When the studio asked her to wear five or six different changes of costume in "As the Earth (Continued on page 83)

Ginger Rogers and Jim Stewart even do the Air Races together. Is it love?

Belles Lettres Note: A recent and highly prized press dispatch is a breathless little paragraph describing the dignified mien of the headwaiter at the Brown Derby. After discussing the personage at considerable length the note ends with: "The only indiscretion the headwaiter permits himself is to write a little poetry now and then in a style reminiscent of John Keats." Make that two orders of Keats, my man, and wrap up a bit of Shelley to take out.

At the moment Bob Taylor is the biggest draw in pictures. Even things he made two years ago are being revived for the edification of large audiences of women, and his studio seems to be making every effort to rush him into as many pictures as possible. The poor guy has made over a dozen pictures in the last year and a half and it looks like he's going to keep on making them as long as he can stand up. Incidentally, he's conferring with his bosses regarding a boost in salary, for he started at the studio at $35 a week and with a few bonuses and such he now makes approximately $750 every pay day. Naturally, it grieves him to know that stars with half his drawing power are pulling in $5000 a week, and since a star's life is a short one, he wants it while he's got it, if you know what he means.

Not that it means anything, but it's sort of a coincidence that Margot Grahame is playing opposite Herbert Marshall in "Make Way for a Lady" while her husband, Francis Lister, is in London co-starring with Edna Best, who is still Mrs. Marshall.

At a movie the other night we tried desperately to hear some of the dialogue, but the competition was too much. A gal a few seats away, an expert gum-cracker, covered every speech and the picture didn't have a chance. In some cases, not hearing the dialogue is a fine thing, but indications were that this picture might be good if we could hear it, so we leaned over to ask the young lady to hold off until we found out what this rich fella was doing in that nice girl's apartment. Imagine our consternation to discover the gum-snapper to be Margaret Sullavan!

The death of Irving Thalberg was a shock to everyone who knew him. Only 37, he was a slave to his job, working almost nightly at the studio and seldom taking a vacation. He earned millions in his brief life span, but he had little time to enjoy them. An ironic overtone to the tragedy was that his death came just a few days before the Hollywood premiere of his wife's biggest picture, "Romeo and Juliet."

A studio-designed wardrobe is final proof that the Quints are now full-fledged stars. Two dozen seamstresses fashioned bonnets, dresses and matching accessories for the Dionne young ladies to wear in their new picture. There are rumors about that Adrian has his eye on the gals. After all, why launch a new mode on just one Jean Harlow?

The social life of the "Born to Dance" cast is really terrific. A few weeks ago, for instance, Frances Langford tossed a swimming and cocktail party at her home for the chorus of the picture, with no men allowed. Then Eleanor Powell cooked a dinner with her own hands for the special benefit of her leading man, Jimmy Stewart, and her studio's publicity department. The publicity department, incidentally, is cooking up with its own little hands a delightful romance between Eleanor and Jimmy. Their love will bloom about the time the picture is released, after which it may slowly fade away.

Sid Silvers, who (with Jack MacGowan) wrote the new Eleanor Powell picture, "Born to Dance," also plays one of the comedy leads. Being author of the thing, Sid wrote himself a swell part, but when he came to play it he found most of it had disappeared. Drawing himself up to his full five feet, he marched into the producer's office to demand an explanation. "We're building you up gradually," said the executive. "We think you're a great comic, Sid. In fact, you've got a lot of Chaplin in you." "I know," said Sid. "You mean I never talk!"

Accident-of-the-month was Lucille Ball's. Lucille, as you know, gives her all to portraying dizzy blondes on the screen. We bumped into her on the RKO lot the other day and she told us all about it. "I tripped over my dog at home," she said, "and bumped my head. Ever since there are moments when my mind is a complete blank." We stepped back ten before we asked her how she could tell.

Did you know that Jean Harlow is studying French? Not that she contemplates moving to Paris or anything. She just thought it would be nice. During the shooting of "Libeled Lady" there were several French guests on the set one day. They met Jean, and someone told them of her linguistic struggles. So they tested her out by asking her to say "I am well" in French. Jean complied. So they tried her on "I am not well." There were a few minutes of Harlow hesitation and then, "Oh, nuts!" So pardon Jean's French.

The vague rumors about that Garbo is ill are true. The Silent One has a serious intestinal ailment, and we just learned that she spent several weeks in a sanitarium last year. On her way to recovery she became bored with the place and thought she'd go home. That the ailment still is serious is evidenced by the fact that "Camille" was held up two weeks with Garbo home in bed.

Local Boys Make Good: Henry Fonda and Randolph Scott, both of this city, recently went East and brought themselves back a couple of wealthy brides. The new Mrs. F. is the widow of George T. At the "Dodsworth" preview there was lengthy applause when Mary Astor first appeared on the screen. As this was her first picture since the recent trial, the applause must have been pleasant music to her ears, for it probably means favorable audience reaction throughout the country. Mary's constant companion, these days, incidentally, is Marcus Goodrich, a writer under contract to RKO. Goodrich, an old friend, is now handling all of the Astor personal affairs.

Joan Crawford has been having a lot of success lately at keeping her pictures pretty much in the family, or perhaps it's merely a coincidence that Franchot Tone appears with her in her last two vehicles. In "The Gorgeous Hussy" Walter Abel originally had the part of young Mr. Eaton, whom Joan finally marries. It was a small part, but a kind writer built it up for Mr. Abel. Then it was promptly handed over to Franchot. In "Love on the Run," in which Joan is co-starred with Clark Gable, Robert Young was set for the second male lead. Again the part was built up, but not for Bob, for once more Franchot stepped in and grabbed it. Some agent, Crawford!

Some fun! Frances Langford and Tony Martin get a great kick out of a fast spin Hollywood-wise.

Carole Lombard has a prowler. Every once in a while, in the vicinity of the home she and Fieldsie recently rented, she heard strange noises. She wasn't making them herself, so she hired a watchman. A few nights later she awoke to discover a flashlight gleaming through the bedroom window and onto her face. But Lombard is never at a loss for words. "Hey!" she yelled. "Are you the watchman, or are you the other guy?" A meek voice replied, "I'm the watchman, madam." "Then," said Carole, "for Gawdsake take that light out of my eyes!"

The Doug Fairbankses (the actor, remember?) cocktailed in mid-air for a group of their friends recently. They hired one of the new 28-passenger planes, piled everybody in and set out. There was dinner and dancing in San Francisco followed by more flying and more cocktailing. Among the guests were Kay Francis and Delmar Daves, and since the plane didn't return until 5 a. m., there were a lot of worried husbands around Hollywood.

The biggest battle of the season was the battle of the false eyelashes, staged by Mae West and Alice Brady during the making of "Go West, Young Man." When Mae appeared with long eye adornments Alice showed up with longer ones. It went on like that for days, but Miss W. won out by the simple procedure of cutting Miss Brady's part here and there. Both gals should have sent for Marlene Dietrich, who's a real authority on the false eyelash subject. Marlene took three dozen pairs of them with her on her recent trip abroad.

Mae West Item: Our spy at an exclusive Hollywood shoppe ("Spying done while you wait" is our motto) reports that Mae is growing. When she first hit Hollywood she slipped into lingerie marked size 14 and now, it is our duty to report, she must have 18. It is heartening to add, though, that Mae still does things with an elegant touch. She never stoops to the gauchery of selecting her lingerie in person—it's all purchased by the Spanish gentleman who is her social secretary.

Another note of elegance is the news that Katharine Hepburn has discarded the station wagon in which she always used to drive to the studio. Perhaps it was the influence of her royal role in "Mary of Scotland"—at any rate, she now reports to work in a shiny new coupe.

Could it be that Connie Bennett is going soft on us? The regal Miss B., who has always been haughty to the press and the common people in general, has now hired herself a publicity agent whose particular job it is to convince everyone that poor Connie has simply been misunderstood. And we can remember Constance when she was considered 'way up town!

A preview audience changed the title of Shirley Temple's new picture from "The Bowery Princess" to "Dimples." Judging from the reaction cards sent in by the customers, everyone felt that "bowery" was a horrid word in connection with little Miss T. After all, she's making $5,000 a week, ain't she? So now it's "Dimples" and everybody's happy.

A TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

By Leo Townsend

Photographically speaking, "Ramona" hasn't been surpassed on the screen. Loretta Young and Don Ameche have the leading roles.

★★★★ The General Died At Dawn

(Paramount)

Put Gary Cooper into a Chinese revolution and you've got something. Add a distinct touch of glamor (that's Chinese for Madeleine Carroll), a few excellent supporting players and a top-flight director and what you've got is a splendid screen drama. "The General Died at Dawn" is as exciting as it is full of intrigue. It is exactly what the words "moving picture" imply, for its photography is beautiful, the composition of its scenes is done with an artistic hand, and the whole thing moves. Gary Cooper portrays an adventurous American whose particular mission of the moment is to combat the forces of General Yang, a marauding gunman who plunders the poor of China. Madeleine Carroll is on the side of the general because her father, Porter Hall, is on his payroll. Eventually, of course, Gary and the poor people win out, but not until General Yang and his murderous cohorts have made things pretty ominous. Akim Tamiroff turns in a superb character job as General Yang, J. M. Kerrigan is excellent as a self-styled detective and Porter Hall's weakling is an inspired bit of acting. Gary Cooper continues the first-rate work he's been doing lately, and Madeleine Carroll, in a Dietrich type of role, manages to be glamorous and believable at the same time.

That British haircut of Gary's is the direct result of a Bermuda vacation. But the souvenir which caused the studio the most trouble was the Cooper coat of tan. He had to sit beneath the studio bleaching lamp for two days before being entrusted to the camera . . . Ever present on a Cooper set these days is "Jedge" Cooper—the tall, lanky and suspendered gentleman from Montana who is Gary's father. The Judge is a great favorite with cast and crew, having a generous number of tales on tap about the old days in Montana to fill dull moments between takes . . . Clifford Odets made his debut on this one not only as a scenario writer but as a movie actor. He shared his big scene with three hundred other "extras"—among them John O'Hara. Madeleine Carroll was regarded with some trepidation as another of "those cold English girls" before she showed up for work on the set. After that, she was known as a swell person. She didn't hold up production for a single cup of tea, either. On the picture's completion, Madeleine sailed for England for a brief visit before returning to Hollywood and more celluloiders . . . The scene which required the greatest length of time to film was not one of those overflowing with extras. It was the one between Gary and Miss Carroll—where he has to punch her in the jaw. Gary just couldn't get the proper punch. "Come on, hit me," urged Madeleine, while Director Milestone clawed his hair in anguish. So Gary promised. Lights went on, cameras turned for a take, Gary let go with a perfect punch in the Carroll jaw—then ruined the whole scene by crying, "Did I hurt you—did I?" . . . To Hans Drier, Paramount art director, went considerable plaudits for his construction of the Chinese village on the studio lot. It was authentic in every detail shown, and represented weeks of intensive study and careful construction. After the picture's completion, part of the village scene was not torn down. It was such a perfect scenic bit that the studio plans to build a "short" around it . . . Location scenes were taken at Chatsworth, while the "ocean" scenes were filmed on the Paramount lake, which was strewn with Chinese scows, battleships, etc., all one-sided affairs since the camera doesn't bother much with rear views . . . Chinese actors are in great demand at present in Hollywood. There's a run on Oriental films, with practically every studio having one planned or in production. Many of the Chinese extra players have been around Hollywood and done these roles for the past fifteen years, and some of them still haven't bothered to learn English.

★★★ Ramona (20th Century-Fox)

In photographic beauty this picture has never been equalled on the screen. You may not have seen advantages in technicolor before, but "Ramona" is sure to change your opinion of the medium. Though color is not "natural" yet, the early California outdoor setting of this film lends itself to the technicolor process with hardly a jarring note. The luxuriant growth of flowers and fruits, the gay colors of Spanish costumes, and the riot of color in the fiesta where Mexicans, Spaniards and Indians join in the festivities, make the perfect background for this Indian love story. And if the story itself had lived up to its trimmings, this would have been one of the outstanding pictures of the year. As it is, the tragedy of Ramona and Allessandro is told with a moving simplicity in the first sequences, but the pace slackens to a drag in the latter ones. Loretta Young's portrayal of the Indian maiden is adequately done. She looks so lovely that an emotional shallowness in some scenes goes unnoticed. Don Ameche is perfectly cast as the Indian hero, and Pauline Frederick does full justice to the role of austere Spanish senora who hardens her heart against her Indian foster-daughter. Kent Taylor is likeable in the role of her son. Jane Darwell and Katherine DeMille are satisfactory in minor roles. "Ramona" is undoubtedly a picture that will please every audience.

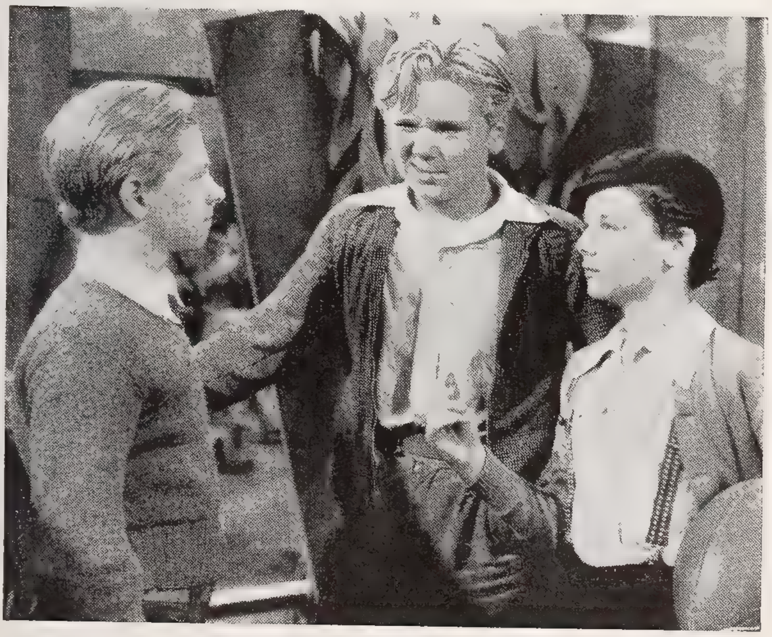
Main location for filming was a 55,000-acre ranch in the Mesa Grande area of the San Jacinto Mountains, 140 miles south of Los Angeles, which was selected only after innumerable color tests had been made of other areas in California . . . Sun, wind, fire and birds combined to furnish formidable obstacles for Director King. Due to the extreme brightness of the sun in the clear mountain air, many scenes had to be filmed under "scrim"—a fragile bobbin netting which softened the overhead light just enough to eliminate glare, every dart of which the color camera would have faithfully reproduced. The continual high winds often ripped the nets to shreds. Other times the powerful arc lights fired the lace-like nettings, which went up like tinder. Months beforehand a cherry orchard and an apple tree had been contracted for use when in full fruit. Both ripened on schedule and Indian boys had to be hired to guard them from the swallows with shot guns . . . More than 3,000 persons took part in making this film. The cast of seventeen feature players, seventy-five minor artists, a technical crew of two-hundred and fifty, the remainder consisting of Indians, and extras, constituted the immense community which went on location. All lived in tents and cabins with the exception of Loretta Young and Kent Taylor, who rented special trailers, complete with two rooms, electric refrigeration, shower baths and all the trimmings. Each night "rushes" of the day's work were shown at an improvised outdoor theatre. Swimming, horseback riding and tennis offered the cast an enjoyable time. Twelve weeks were spent filming location scenes before the company returned to the studio for another three weeks of interiors . . . Don Ameche started stage work eight years ago in Madison, Wisconsin, substituting at the last minute for a main character in "Excess Baggage." Later he entered radio work and was snatched up my movie moguls in short order. He will broadcast from Hollywood now, due to picture engagements lined up for him.

★★★ Craig's Wife (Columbia)

On the stage, "Craig's Wife" was a Puiltzer Prize winner back in the days when the Pulitzer Prize meant it was the best play of the year. On the screen, it is one of the most impelling dramas of the season. Rosalind Russell, in the title role, is a complete shrew, a coldly beautiful woman who loves only her cold beautiful home. Her husband and her friends are mere annoyances who are tolerated only in the degree that they can be of value to her. She believes in marriage only because, as an institution, it gives her security and, in her own case, wealth. Her husband's friends no longer come to her because there is no welcome there. Gradually her selfish existence closes in on her and one by one maid, cook, sister and finally her husband walk out on her, leaving her with her fine empty home. It's a tragic picture, and one which you wouldn't soon forget. Rosalind Russell's performance definitely stamps her as an actress of the first rank. She's so good you'll despise her. John Boles is better than usual as her husband, and there are fine performances by Jane Darwell as the cook and Billie Burke as a next-door neighbor. Much of the picture's power is due to the able and sensitive direction of Dorothy Arzner.

See Modern Screen's Movie Scoreboard on page 22.



These youngsters, Mickey Rooney, Jackie Cooper and Freddie Bartholomew, turn in excellent performances in "The Devil is a Sissy."

Rosalind Russell is so good in the title role of "Craig's Wife" that you'll hate her. Assisted by John Boles and a very fine cast.

Known as Russell's Last Stand, this picture was awaited with great curiosity around town. Rosalind was forced into the role against her better judgment, which makes the celluloider's triumph considerably more interesting . . . It's a woman's picture from start to finish. Directed by Dorothy Arzner, edited by Viola Lawrence, scenarioed by Mary McCall, Jr., and starred by Miss Russell. Dorothy Arzner is Hollywood's only female director. She started out as a typist at Columbia but gave herself a five-year plan for bigger and better things. In three years she was directing . . . The set for this one was undoubtedly one of the most artistic and complete interiors ever constructed on a lot. A ten-room house was built in its entirety, with an estimated cost of $60,000 in furnishings. Exteriors were filmed at a home in Beverly Hills . . . Two brides of four months worked on this picture. Dorothy Wilson is now Mrs. Lewis Foster, while Kathleen Burke has married Juan Fernandez, a dance director at Paramount . . . John Boles found time for this film between personal appearances in Cincinnati, Montreal and Toronto. While in Hollywood he is rarely seen out, except to and from the studio. John is perfectly contented to stay in his Santa Monica beach home with his wife and daughters and forsake the bright lights of Hollywood . . . Rosalind Russell is another who'd just as soon stay at home—at least while in Hollywood. But of late she's been kept on the run between one night club and another. The reason being Mary Jane Russell, who is Rosalind's sister and a first-time Hollywood visitor. She seems to like Cinema Town a lot.

AROUND THE TOWN

Elissa Landi is back in Hollywood and busily at work in "The White Dragon." However, her off-screen hours are occupied socially with the handsome Nino Martini. Here the two of them pose for Scotty while spending a recent evening at the popular Trocadero. Nice looking pair, huh?

Now it's June Travis who seems to have captured the dating time of Cesar Romero. Cesar usually turns up at events with Virginia Bruce or Betty Furness but here he is at the Biltmore Bowl, smiling adoringly into June's piquant face. And she seems to be enjoying the attention, too.

"Have a peanut," said Glenda Farrell as she leaned across the bar at her own gay party recently. And, not to be left out, Mary Brian hurries up with a batch of popcorn. Barton MacLane can't seem to make up his mind but Wini Shaw dips right into the dish. The party was a Farrell success.

HUMPHREY'S HALCYON DAYS

By Ruth Rankin

THIS STORY is about Humphrey Bogart, late of the New York stage, now in and of Hollywood. Humphrey was the man without the shave, in "Petrified Forest," who made Dillinger look like a sissy. He menaced things up in great shape for "Bullets and Ballots"—he was that nasty man named Fenner, who finally shot the hero. Now, after all, the man who shoots the hero in any picture is pretty important.

They are lining up things fast for Humphrey over at Warners where they predict stardom for him within three years.

Well, all I have to say is, it will be no fault of Humphrey's. He will have to be a star in spite of himself. He hasn't the remotest idea of playing studio politics and wouldn't if he could. He can't suppress his joy in the fact that he has no tact and an unholy habit of not minding his own business. And by the time three years have elapsed, he will have had a fight with everyone on the lot. However, everyone will wind up by liking him because he won't sit still and take it. Anybody who gives him an argument will have to see it through—and Humphrey will even start the argument, if things look sorta slow.

Someone once remarked that Humphrey's father probably had to be a doctor to keep Humphrey sewed up. Enough stitches have been taken in that guy to run up a little light summer dancing frock, with ruffles.

The first time I ever saw him—it was in 1918—he was laid out on a sidewalk in New York's Greenwich Village. It seems that a girl in a doorway yelled "help" and Humphrey responded. The girl faded out when he got there and two tough gents emerged from the shadows, intent upon his wallet. They got it—but they had to fight for it. We happened along two minutes later, picked up all we could find of Humphrey, took it home with us and telephoned for Dr. Bogart, who seemed less surprised than would be ordinarily indicated. I guess he'd been called before, on similar occasions.

It was the beginning of a beautiful friendship which has lasted eighteen years, or until Humphrey reads this inspired revelation.

He carried a souvenir from that little fracas for some time—an upper lip like an awning, which blurred his speech but didn't stop Humphrey from talking. Finally his papa took a pleat in it and you'd never know the difference now. But at that time it didn't look as if Humphrey would be an actor. (Continued on page 95)

Girls, who knew-Humphrey-when, say dates with him were colored by speedy driving and battles!

SHE HAS

And so Claudette is adored

Claudette and her husband, Dr. Joel Pressman, attend the Night of Stars show.

WHERE IS that woman?" And nobody smiles when they say that either. The scene is Paramount's publicity department. It is twelve forty-five. Claudette was due at eleven for her first interview. At eleven forty-five she was to have had her second. At twelve-thirty, her third. The three interviewers—and interviewers should never meet in the same line-up—are sitting in a row, pock-marking pencils and optically slaying each other. The boy from the portrait gallery breezes in. "Am I going to get Claudette at one?" The publicity woman throws a memo pad at him. He retreats, but comes back a second later. "That reminds me. You told her to bring those new furs of hers? We're counting on them for winter fashion releases." This time the publicity gal controls herself. "I told her. But you know Claudette! If she doesn't bring them, don't blame me."

Then suddenly Claudette appears, standing in the door in a pair of dark blue slacks. She smiles and peeks out sheepishly from behind dark glasses. "Hello, everybody. I'm so dreadfully sorry!" She greets them all, all around, with some personal word. Then she asks the publicity girl if she may speak to her for a moment outside. A moment's conference. The girl returns alone. Her eyes are frantic, appealing. But a faint smile twitches her mouth. "Sorry, kids, Claudette's got a luncheon date. A friend from New York. She wants to know if you'll please excuse her until afterward. She's sorry, but she sort of got everything all bawled up."

A hushful moment. To hide their eye-softness, three writers look floorward. Three pair of feet do a school-room shuffle. "S'all right with me," the male writer, first. "I don't mind either," one of the girls. "I'm hungry myself," sympathizes the other.

Claudette Colbert charm? Yes, Claudette has that certain something which enables her to "get away with murder."

THAT PHRASE might also apply to the charm that guards her life, for if there is magic in her smile, there is no less of it in the godmother wand that controls her destiny. When she was fourteen she was run over by a two-ton truck and lived to tell the tale. When she was eighteen, doctors told her she had stomach trouble from which she would never recover and a year later she defied them to find a trace of it. In 1930 on an around-the-world trip on a tramp steamer, she arrived at the Malay peninsula, the only healthy passenger on the boat. The others were sick with malaria. And so on and on. Dangers to her career, as well as her life, were just as easily waved away. Very few actresses, before or since, have survived the number of play flops that she survived during the early part of her career.

Then came what surely must be the end—the announcement that Claudette was picking her own next play. That such a newcomer could pick anything but another flop was inconceivable. But the wand waved, Claudette muttered "Abacadabra" and "The Barker" turned out to be a hit, the first and the biggest in her whole career.

The incident of "It Happened One Night," about which you have heard umpteen times, is another example of her uncanny luck in story selection. Constance Bennett and Miriam Hopkins had turned it down when Claudette Colbert accepted it. Claudette was in a bit of a career-pickle, too, when that picture came along. She was badly in need of something to get her out of it.

But—and that's the point I'm making—Claudette always gets out of everything. It may be a good story that does the smoothing-over, but mostly it's that smile, that appealing something I referred to back in the beginning of this opus. And no matter what the evidence against her. There was that time she should have been arrested, for example. That was in the days when she was just fifteen-year-old Lily Chauchoin. Claudette laughs as she recalls it.

ONLY IT wasn't so funny then. It was my first driving experience. I didn't have a license or even a permit, and the car wasn't mine. It was a brand new one belonging to Harry Wolf, a friend of the family's. How he ever happened to let me drive it, I don't know. But anyway, there I was behind the wheel breezing down New York's 72nd Street in the very heaviest evening traffic, when I stalled right in the middle of the trolley tracks. The traffic piled up behind me and an irate policeman came over to see what was the matter. There was nothing really the matter except that I hadn't the least idea of how to start

It has been a long wait between pictures for Claudette's fans. Her newest picture is "Maid of Salem." Right, she and Bonita Granville appear in a scene from it.

Henry Fonda and Mrs. Frances Seymour Brokaw met abroad last summer. Their engagement, announced from there, came as a great surprise. They were wed in a fashionable church ceremony in New York on September 16th and left for Hollywood at once.

A POUND OF CURE

By Mary Marshall

You'll never hear a screen star make that feeble excuse, "Oh, ten extra pounds is rather becoming, don't you think?" Beauties like Carole Lombard realize that their star sets when that svelte figure begins to show a rubber tire waistline.

Joan Blondell is a shining example to all who insist that it's simpler to be "pleasingly plump" than divinely slender. Joan literally shaved the pounds off to gain that alluring figure with its softly curved contour. You can do it, too. Try!

That old bogey, "the fat forties," won't get you if you watch your step between twenty and the early thirties

THERE COMES a day in the life of even the best-looking lass when she suddenly realizes that she ought to "do something" about herself—about her figure, skin or hair. One girl in twenty actually does "do something," and that's a very conservative estimate. The other nineteen young ladies are all too inclined to say—and quite humanly enough—one of several things: "Oh, that ten extra pounds is rather becoming, don't you think? I was really too thin." Or, "I guess it's natural to gain a few pounds—or a few lines—as one gets older." Or something else which is nice and comforting but which, as the song goes, "ain't necessarily so."

I want to hold the floor for the duration of this article about girls from the early twenties to the early thirties. There's no good reason nowadays why anyone should look materially older at thirty-two than one does at twenty-two. That certain girlishness departs with the passage of ten years, and so it should. But physically speaking—from the standpoint of figure, skin and hair—the passage of a decade should tell no age secrets.

It's all very well for me, sez you, to adorn these two pages with pictures of the Misses Harlow, Colbert, Lombard and Blondell. "What have they got to do with me?" asks you. "They're beautiful. I'm not. They've got money. I haven't. They can hire masseuses. I can't. They can . . . " But save the rest of it, my sweeties, for I'm way ahead of you.

LEAVING THESE beauteous gals right where they are in their artistic poses for a moment, let me give you what I consider, in my not too humble opinion, an ideal for every one of you to follow, from the early twenties right on into the thirties and—yes, lady—clear through to middle age also. Here 'tis:

1. Clean, flowing body lines, whatever your size. Your chassis may not have the "oomph" of a Dietrich, but you can emulate Dietrich's splendid posture. You absolutely need not have lumps here and (Continued on page 88)

FREEDOM'S A FLOP..!

And Tom Brown, who has waited long to attain it, tells you why

By Franc Dillon

IT WOULDN'T be much of an exaggeration to say that the greatest disappointment Tom Brown ever had came to him on his twenty-first birthday.

Of course there was a party, a grand one given by his parents at a local hotel, with presents and a birthday cake with candles and an orchestra and all his friends there to wish him well and help him celebrate. Everything was, apparently, perfect, including the fact that the party was a complete surprise to Tom. But just the same Tom was bitterly disappointed.

"I don't know what exactly I expected to happen on that day," Tom said, in talking of it, "but as far back as I can remember I had looked forward to and planned for it. I'm sure I didn't expect to wake up and find that I had a long, grey beard or anything like that," he laughed, "but I did anticipate some startling changes that weren't forthcoming."

WHEN THE doorbell rang one noon recently and I found Tom standing on my doorstep, my first thought was of food, for what boy isn't hungry, especially at meal time?

"I was just going by," he explained with an impish grin, "and I thought I'd better stop and see if you were behaving yourself."

"Hungry?" I asked suspiciously.

"No, honest, but if you don't mind, I'd like a glass of milk. You think it's funny for me to be drinking milk?" he asked. "Well, it is, really. That is, considering that all my life I looked forward to the time when I would be old enough to accept a glass of beer or a highball when it was offered to me. Now that I'm of age, I don't want it. In fact, I'm strictly on the water wagon."

And that is how this conversation began, during which he told me all the things he had expected from life when he should be twenty-one, all the dreams he had which had exploded in his face. (Continued on page 85)

Tom thinks it's fun to be twenty-one, but it has its drawbacks, too.

Nick Lukats, Priscilla Lawson and Tom appear in "Rose Bowl."

IS BEAUTY A BOOMERANG?

Virginia Bruce's answer will hearten all girls who long for it

By Faith Service

A great beauty herself, Virginia has had beaux and adulation galore, so she knows the answer! "Born to Dance" is her newest screen appearance.

ISN'T BEAUTY, a boomerang, in a way?" I said to Virginia, on an impulse.

"What say?" asked Virginia, her delicate brows lifted slightly.

We were sitting in the sunlight, outside Virginia's dressing-room on the studio lot. The white-gold sun of California, which shows many a noted beauty to be something made-up while electric lights do not, made of Virginia something whiter and golder than the sunlight. She wore a pale blue sweater, a rose sport skirt, a rose scarf, bobby socks and sneaks. Her golden hair, hung loosely about her face. She looked sixteen and like a poem, a valentine, a song, a dream.

I recalled how, at odd times, Jimmy Stewart, Spencer Tracy, Clark Gable, Cesar Romero and other cavaliers had spoken of Virginia's beauty. I glanced at the volume she held in her hands, Maurois' "Life of Byron." I thought back to her passionate, self-sacrificing love for John Gilbert, her eagerness to retire completely from public life when she married him, her deep, maternal love for the small Susan and her often reiterated desire to have other children. I wondered whether the reputation of being a Great Beauty, deserved as it most authentically is, satisfied this girl who has more than a silky skin, golden hair and eyes as blue as forget-me-nots.

So I asked her. And she laughed, or rather, to tell the plain truth, she snorted. And she replied, "You're not trying to make me admit that I am 'a beauty,' are you, for heaven's sake? Because, in the first place, it's ridiculous. And in the second place I hate to be so labelled—even with such lovely libel.

"I do think beauty can be a curse. I don't want to be known as a beauty. I think the reputation of being one starves a girl of most of life. And just so you won't contribute to any such mistaken ideas about me, I can tell you half a dozen things that are wrong with my face. Half a dozen things I hate about myself!"

"I dare you!" I said.

"Take you on," laughed Virginia. "I hate my chin. Look at it! Can you find it? (Continued on page 78)

Wang greets his new wife, O-lan, from The Great House.

O-lan, once a slave, works hard for her beloved Wang.

INTO THE eyes of Wang, the farmer, came a furtive, frightened look. He glanced surreptitiously from the great cauldron of hot water on the stove to his aged father, making such a to-do there with his bowl of tea. Tea, by the gods, which the Old One—grumbling between great drafts of the fragrant beverage—declared was like silver and too good for poor farmers who should be content with hot water to warm their lungs of a morning. But then, as Wang had said, in excuse, "This is the day!"

Young Wang, the furtive look gone, decided to throw caution to the winds. He started to take the whole cauldron of water—not just a panful—into the inner room, attempting with very poor success an air of nonchalance. The Old One glanced up from his tea. What was this, what was this?

"Now there's enough water to bring a crop to fruit!" His thin voice crackled with amazement.

Wang, his great shoulders bending not one whit under the cauldron's weight, mumbled low, "Father, I haven't washed my body all at once since the New Year."

"It won't do—it won't do," said the old man. "Starting your woman like this—tea in the morning, and all this washing!"

Your woman! For days, Wang had thought of nothing else. A woman! A wife! Of course, he had not yet seen her—it would not have been seemly. But his father had assured him that, though she was only a kitchen slave in the Great House of Hwang, she was not deformed, nor did she have a hare-lip. Wang dared not hope for a pretty face—nor small feet. But anyway there would be someone to work with him in the fields. Someone to bring a semblance of home to their humble dwelling. Someone who would bear him sons, the gods willing. . . .

Now the Father, who was really a kindly old man for all his complaining manner, was led by Wang's long-considered persuasion not to cry their poverty too loudly at the suggestion of a feast that night—a very small feast. Indeed, when neighbor Ching came by their door bearing a jug of wine "for the bridegroom!" the Father set forth the feast as his very own idea.

"If you will come," he invited farmer Ching, "my son will be honored, for you were boys together."

In the inner room, Wang grinned delightedly and recklessly splashed a little more water over his strong body. This was the day! . . .

The woman sat there, never moving, by the kitchen door of the Great House. Beside her, from a sink, drain water dripped into a bucket. On her other side was a heavy wooden box, its hinges gone. Giggling and chattering slaves passed and re-passed.

"He is here—the bridegroom!"

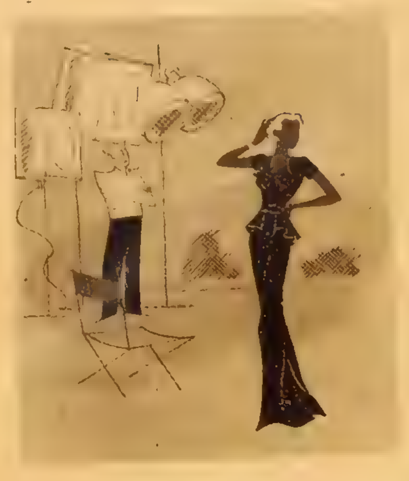
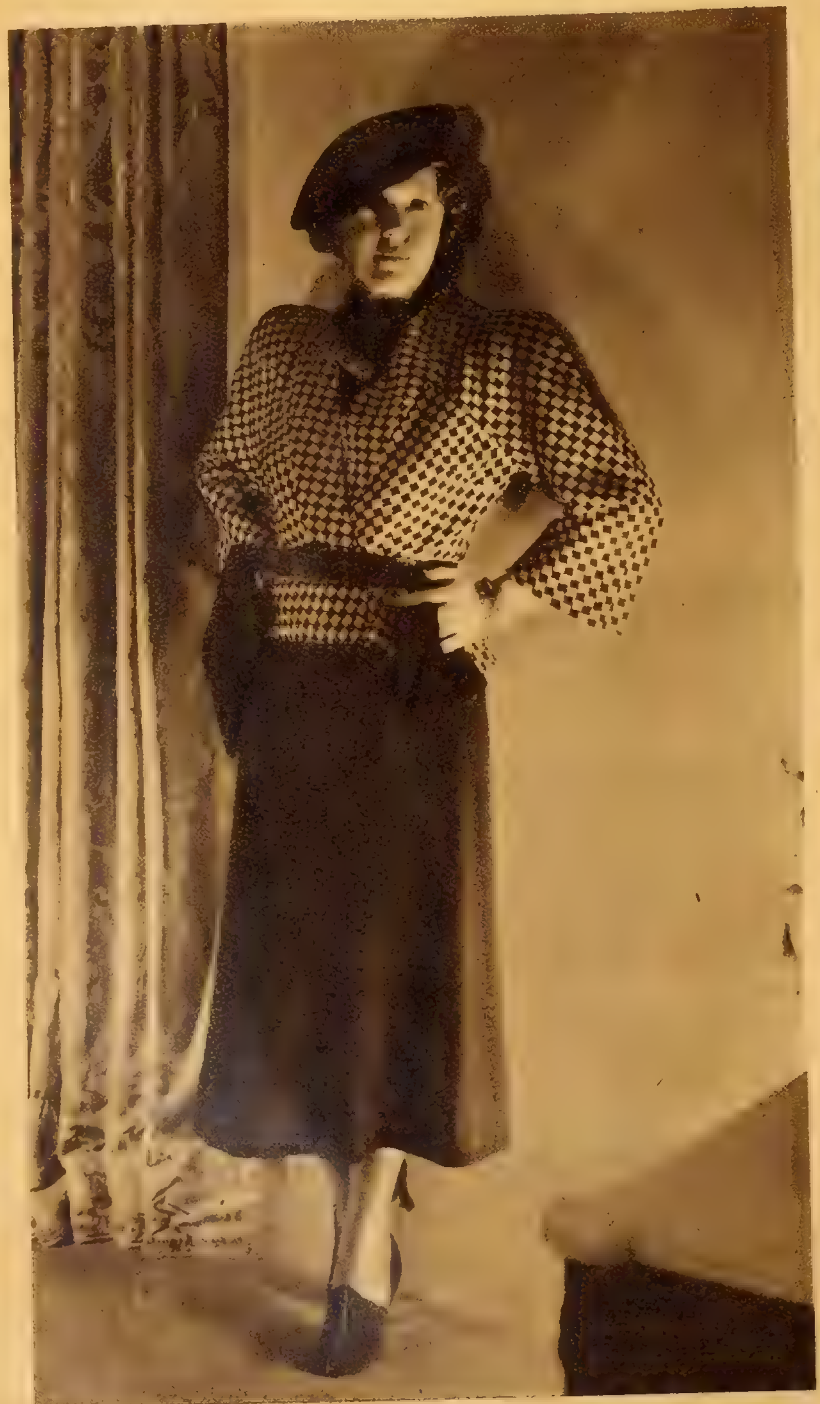
. . . A STAR AND HER

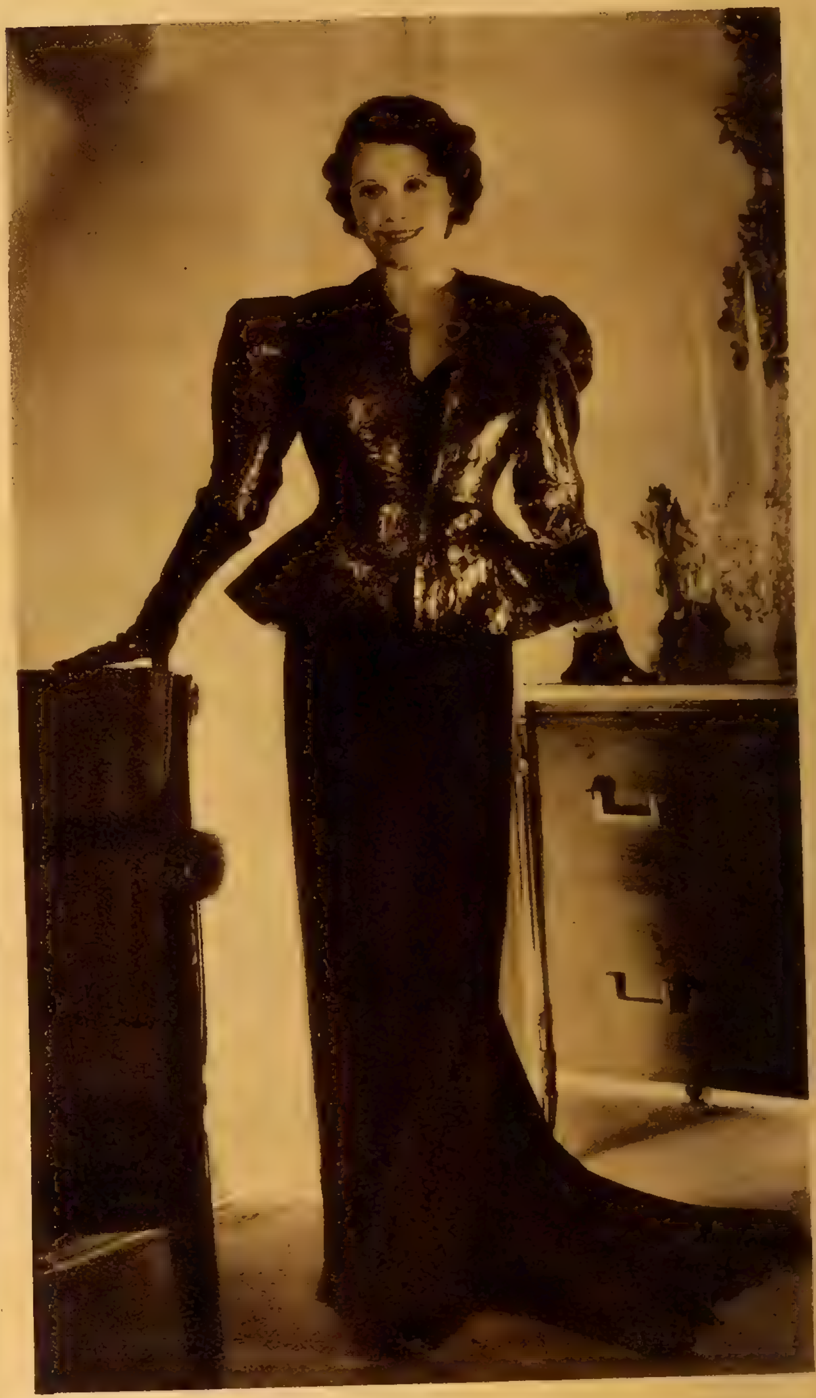
Ruth Chatterton tells why worth" clothes so very much



Omar Kiam has used the dramatic peplum flare to accent a short lamé jacket worn over a simple black gown. The fitted waist and wider shoulders are of the new line.

Ruth bought this two-piece woolen costume for her personal wardrobe upon the completion of the picture. The top is a black and white check woolen and the skirt is black woolen cut with a circular flare.





FOR YEARS Ruth Chatterton had to traipse about Hollywood under the burden of one of those strange titles which seem to cling to some celebrities like moss or sticking plaster. Her special tag was "first lady of the screen," if you can imagine a stuffier title to affix to a person, especially one with a sense of humor and a vivacious personality like Ruth's. Anyway, it must have depressed Ruth thoroughly, for she seemed to dress like a first something-or-other with the result that she looked dignified, unhappy and definitely frosted. Then came her temporary retirement from the screen—and lo, the next any of us saw of la Chatterton, there had been an amazing transformation. She emerged as a very dusty and slightly hectic lady aviator (aviatrix, to you) who was sailing madly through the skies in an air derby. She posed, grinning broadly, arrayed in the decidedly casual garb of the airways. Very little of the formerly veddy elegant Miss Chatterton has been visible in either press pictures or newsreels since.

Over a trim little brown tweed suit, Ruth wears a beige woolen cape trimmed with bands of leopard. Colorful pheasant tail feathers trim her brown felt hat.

Typical of the new flare in costumes is the black wool coat below. The bodice is slightly fitted and the skirt part opens at front. Lavish silver fox trims the collar and forms the huge muff she carries.

And now, with her return to the screen, she steps out as still another personality. It is as if she has blended her two former selves into a new and very exciting version—one that has the well-groomed, chic appearance of the screen star and the other, the casual, gay person who pilots airplanes with a devil-may-care outlook on both life and wearing apparel. If you have seen her as Fran in "Dodsworth" you'll understand what I mean. However, you don't even have to wait for that, you need only to study this array of interesting costumes which Omar Kiam has designed for her to wear in the picture. Since she has bought several of these for her personal wardrobe, you can see that Kiam knows his star designing to a T.

ANYONE WHO interviews Ruth on the subject of clothes invariably gets the quick answer, "I prefer slacks." And she does, what is more. But her preferences fortunately don't end at slacks. She loves the comfort of trousers and, since she spends so much of her off-screen time in her airplane, she naturally has a number of slacks which are perfectly suited to her strenuous hobby. But, when she is "grounded" for her more social hours 'round and about Hollywood, she reverts to type and dresses with great care and a definite flair for smartness.

Talking to me about clothes recently, Ruth said, "I prefer simple things, generally in black and white, although occasionally I see something in a color that strikes my fancy. Also I like a touch of color somewhere in my costume or in a piece of jewelry. I particularly am fond of rubies and whatever jewels I may wear you'll usually find some of those beautiful red stones in them. However, please let me impress the fact that I own few jewels and seldom wear what I have."

If you look closely at these costumes pictured, you will see the few carefully chosen pieces of fine jewelry which she does wear. And most of these were (Continued on page 86)

A dressing gown made like a redingote is another one of Kiam's novel ideas. This one of Ruth's is designed to be worn over a heavy satin nightgown which is pleated from the lace yoke to the hem. The robe is made of a brocaded red and and white satin—as warm as it is lovely.

POISE is in your hands

There is nothing more captivating than the appearance of perfect ease. Call it what you will, but the natural charm of the man or woman whose every motion breathes confidence, is magnetic...

What is so surprising is to discover how much of this impression is dependent upon the hands. Watch the hands of a speaker. Notice the hands of your favorite actress in action. Or bring it closer home and see how your own hands behave.

Do you find yourself hunting for rough spots? Is one hand always busy exploring the other for defects? It is so easy to fall into the habit of appearing awkward by letting your hands ruin your poise. Make your hands an asset to your personality. It is so easy!

The first step is to keep your hands smooth and delicately fragrant. Your hands must be comfortable to you! When they are comfortable and attractive to you, they just naturally appear graceful to others.

Just try the Frostilla treatment for a week or so...your poise will improve tremendously.

Frostilla is the perfect skin lotion...For over 60 years it has been recognized as the first and basic requirement to skin loveliness.

Frostilla stands apart from other lotions and creams because it does two things. First, it makes the skin smooth, attractive to the touch and delicately fragrant. Second, it imparts to the skin the resiliency that is essential, if the skin is to maintain a youthful appearance.

Fourteen exquisite flowers from Southern France contribute their perfume to Frostilla Lotion. Another ingredient is selected from certain trees found in the Ural Mountains of Russia. No place is too distant, no care too great to bring to Frostilla the qualities that make it the soothing lotion that protects and conditions the skin.

Make these two tests and you will never be satisfied with anything less than Frostilla Fragrant Lotion.

Test No. 1. Take your most expensive perfume, a bottle of Frostilla and any other lotion or cream...Then, after smelling your favorite perfume as a standard of fragrance, smell the other two. You will quickly discard all other lotions and creams in favor of Frostilla Fragrant Lotion. Its quality is instantly apparent.

Test No. 2. Dip a toothpick in Frostilla and another one in any other cream or lotion... Let them dry! Then slip your fingers along the toothpicks. You will find that Frostilla leaves no gummy or soapy residue. Frostilla does not "coat" the skin. It is a true skin conditioner.

35c, 50c and $1.00 sizes everywhere.
Travel size at ten-cent stores.

A Gift for Frostilla's Friends . . . What do you do with your little finger when you pick up a glass or cup? How do you hold a cigarette? Pick up cards? Shake hands? Margery Wilson gives the authoritative answers to these and other questions in an illustrated booklet on how to use your hands correctly. Although this booklet is priced at 50c, we have arranged to present it without charge to Frostilla users in the United States and Canada until May 30, 1937.

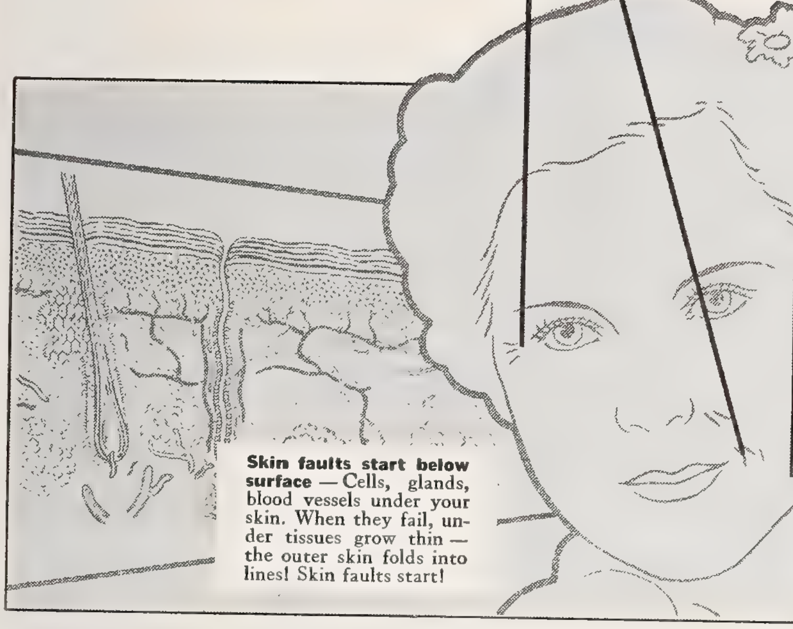
LINES SAY "over 30!"



Skin faults start below surface — Cells, glands, blood vessels under your skin. When they fail, under tissues grow thin — the outer skin folds into lines! Skin faults start!

Miss Esther Brooks, much admired in New York this past winter, says: "Pond's Cold Cream takes every speck of dirt out of my pores, keeps my skin clear of blackheads."

A Sign that UNDER TISSUES are Shrinking!

THOSE mean little lines that creep in around your eyes, your mouth . . . You are only 25. But people see them—"She's every bit of thirty!"

Or, you are over thirty . . . but not a sign of a line. And everybody takes you for years younger than you are—"Not a day over 20!"

Do you know what those same little lines say to a dermatologist? He sees right through them to the under layers of your skin, and says: "It's the under tissues at fault!"

Keep away Blackheads, Blemishes —with Under Skin treatment

Skin faults are not always a matter of years. Look at the skin diagram above. Those hundreds of tiny cells, glands, fibres under your skin are what really make it clear and satiny—or full of faults! Once they fail, skin faults begin. But keep them active—you can, with Pond's rousing "deep-skin" treatment—and your skin blooms fresh, line-free, as in your teens.

Pond's Cold Cream contains specially processed oils which reach deep into the pores. It floats out all the dirt, make-up, skin secretions that are starting to clog. Already, your skin looks fresher!

More . . . You pat this perfectly balanced cream briskly into your skin . . . Start the circulation pulsing, oil glands working freely.

Do this regularly—day after day. Before long, cloggings cease. Pores grow finer. Blackheads, blemishes go . . . And those myriads of little fibres strengthen! Your skin grows firm underneath—smooth, line-free outside, where it shows.

Mrs. Eugene du Pont III

whose fresh, glowing skin just radiates youth and beauty, says: "Pond's Cold Cream freshens me up right away . . . It takes away that tired look and makes 'late-hour' lines fade completely."

Here's the simple Pond's way to win the clear, glowing skin that never tells of birthdays. Follow this treatment day and night.

Two things to remember

Every night, cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream. Watch it bring out all the dirt, make-up, secretions. Wipe it all off! . . . Now pat in more cream briskly. Rouse that failing underskin. Set it to work again —for that smooth, line-free skin you want.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat this treatment with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin becomes softer, finer every time. Powder goes on beautifully.

Start in at once. The coupon below brings you a special 9-treatment tube of Pond's Cold Cream.

Meals in Jig-Time

particular problem—and mighty ingenious were her suggestions, too. Of course, where, with many of us, our approach to the subject of quick-meal planning is often but a sad example of familiarity breeding contempt, with Ginger the problem is sufficiently unusual to merit some real, constructive thought, with the inevitable and happy result that she has collected and invented some excellent and original ideas, which I, in turn, will pass on to you in this month's recipe leaflet. The coupon at the end of this article will bring you her recipe suggestions—entirely free of charge. Not only that, but this same coupon will also bring you a little booklet put out by a prominent manufacturer, containing a large number of candy and cookie recipes which can be described as "quickies," too. Think of that! All yours for the asking—cookies and candies for the approaching holidays as well as Ginger Rogers' pet dishes.

But let's review briefly here these suggestions of Ginger's. For, in so doing, many other ideas are bound to come up that will help us all in making up menus for our own meals.

Naturally, you will find that canned and packaged foods play important roles in such a production. For, in the preparation of meals in jig-time, you will have to rely largely upon the ready-prepared or almost-prepared foods put up in cans, bottles and boxes which now are offered in such variety on your grocer's shelves. You would do well to make a careful study of this supply, whether you are of the fortunate few who, like Ginger, prepare "quickie" meals only when you change your mind at the last minute about going out, or whether you belong to the vast army of business women to whom the quick-meal problem is a daily one. Even the afternoon bridge players and the natural-born procrastinators are sure to enjoy the suggestions Ginger's leaflet has to offer along these lines. So let's see what it contains.

First there is the Rogers' Supper Ring pictured at the beginning of this article. Strictly speaking this isn't a recipe but a "collection" with several well-known favorites suggested in an unusual combination. One of the cards in the Rogers' leaflet tells you how to go about assembling this main course dish and making it so that you'll have only one pot to scour. You see, both the salmon and the canned soup, that are combined to make the noodle ring filling, are heated in a saucepan of boiling water right in the cans they come in. Then if you have one of the new can openers (also pictured) you'll be able to lift out the cans and open them with but a flick of the wrist and no danger of scalding. It's a neat trick.

Another good point about this recipe card is that it gives you the exact amount by cupsful, as well as the size cans required for a service for four. Right here, I want to stop the dialogue for an important aside on the amounts contained in cans of various sizes. As you know, the weight of the contents is given on the paper wrappers. But the following table will show you how to figure approximately how many cups you'll be getting by purchasing cans called No. 1, No. 2, etc. This is an important table to have when making purchases and in following recipes, so be sure and copy it down for future reference.

You never will have any cooking missteps with canned foods, if you follow this.

SIZE OF CAN	AVERAGE CONTENTS
No. 1 (tall)	2 cups
No. 2	2½ cups
No. 2½	3½ cups
No. 3	4 cups
No. 10	13 cups

And now to return to Ginger and her "quickie" recipes. Another favorite main course dish that she described to me is one she has named "Meat Rounds with Sauce Piquante." For these she uses club steaks or filet mignon, but I suggest that for economy's sake you substitute chopped meat (preferably top round, ground). I made that substitution myself in testing the recipe and I can't see how it could have been better, for after all it's the sauce that makes this dish—as is so often the case. And in this instance, at least, the sauce is fixed in a jiffy with the sort of things found on every well-stocked kitchen shelf.

AN excellent vegetable suggestion of Ginger's is Harvard Beets. These should be made with the tiny canned or bottled beets that are known to be fully as nutritious as the home-cooked variety and which lend themselves to many uses without hours of fuss and bother. Use them in salads, as colorful garnishes, as a relish, as well as in the tasty dish mentioned above.

For the dessert course Ginger came through with two excellent ideas. One is called Dinner Dates, and the other, Pineapple Surprise. Both are dressy enough to serve for company dinners, yet they're easily and quickly prepared. With the first you will want to serve some sort of sweet cracker—one of the infinite number of packaged cookies now available to all. The Pineapple Surprise, however, is complete in itself and suggests but one of the many ways you can use store sponge cake. For these packaged sponge cakes can be made into delicious shortcakes with fresh or canned fruits. Or try one, some night, as a Cottage Pudding, with a sauce made from left-over canned fruit juice thickened a little with cornstarch.

Of course, I'm giving you both of Ginger's recipes in this month's leaflets. But even at that I feel that I'm just skimming off the cream for countless other ideas for "quickie" meals crowd into my mind as I write this. Why, I haven't even mentioned canned tomato juice and the many varieties of delicious canned soups which introduce a meal so graciously! Then, of course, there are those filling and ever-welcome canned foods, spaghetti and baked beans. Excellent in themselves, they also lend themselves to a number of variations. For instance, both beans and spaghetti are delicious used as a stuffing for green peppers or tomatoes. They take on new appeal for the family if you vary the meats with which they are served. They're both especially tempting served with little brown pork sausages or sliced ham, I've found; while baked beans with pork, and spaghetti with meat balls, are already too popular to require any additional words of praise from me.

In seeking speed without sacrificing quality, don't overlook canned meats, either. Many can't be surpassed and I know that in my own case, for instance, I prefer canned corned beef hash to the kind I laboriously fix up myself—any day!

As for canned fruits, they deserve and will receive my attention at a later date in an article all to themselves. But before I forget—and in case you don't know about them—let me urge you to try the

Betty's "strike" was settled an easy, pleasant way—

THE Lux way of washing stockings makes them wear ever so much longer! The life of a stocking depends on its elasticity. That's the ability of silk to give under strain, then spring back without breaking. Lux saves this elasticity.

Soaps containing harmful alkali and cake-soap rubbing weaken elasticity. Avoid them, and cut down on runs! Lux has no harmful alkali. You'll find it's real stocking insurance to Lux stockings after every wearing.

Here's a tip—you can speed up drying by rolling stockings in a towel to absorb moisture. Then it's quicker and easier to pull them into shape, too.

packaged cake mixes now on the market. They've improved so greatly of late that they can invite comparison with home-mixed ones. And what a saving in time and effort these Devil's Food and Gingerbread mixes represent.

And now in the few inches of space still left to me I want to point out to you the importance of seasoning canned foods to your own individual taste. Because, you see, the food manufacturer must strive to please the largest possible number of buyers—or to put it in another way he must not offend the majority by seasoning his product too highly or too distinctively. For that reason most canned foods are, of necessity, bland in flavor. So it is up to you to pep them up according to your own preferences and those of the members of your family. Don't condemn the product because it fails to have a certain seasoning you think essential—just add the missing something, be it a pinch of curry, a little more ginger, a dash of celery salt, a suggestion of garlic, etc. The improvement will surprise and delight you and incidentally that improvement represents the difference between a plain Can-Opener Cook and a successful producer of "quickie" meals, prepared in jig-time. the leading man. He didn't understudy so long, either. Paramount talent scouts were watching and in April of 1934 he put his John Henry on a long-term contract. You will see him soon in "Maid of Salem."

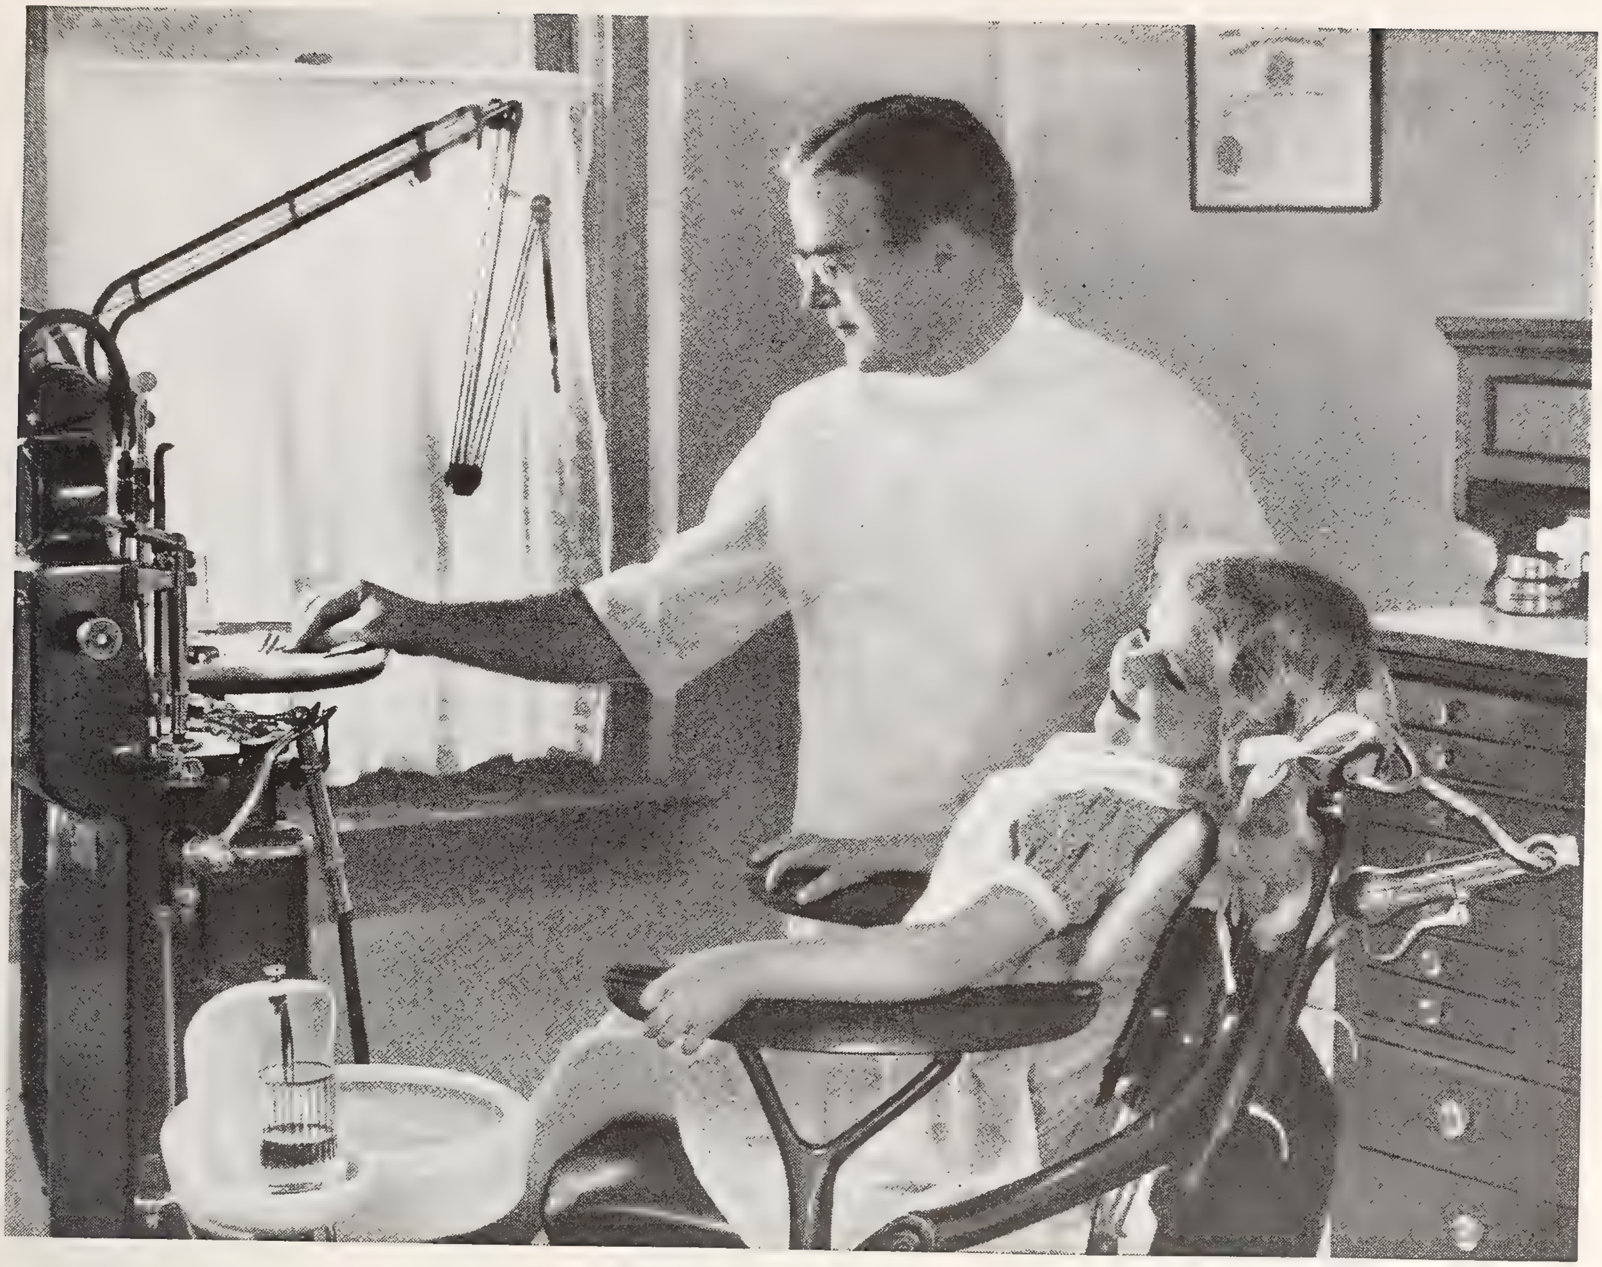
LA VONNE EDWARDS, San Bernardino, California; HELEN MOORE, Greensboro, N. C.; BARBARA GOUGH, Rochester, N. Y.—"That handsome chap" is what you three girls all agree in calling the young Lochinvar who sang, "When I'm with You" in "Poor Little Rich Girl," and you all are dying to know who he is. The name is Tony Martin. If you like him so much, be sure not to miss him in "Sing Baby Sing" where he plays the part of Tony Renaldo.

KATHARINE HEPBURN: Miss Hepburn fought and won her own war of liberation from the dictatorship of her stage directors. She collected as indemnity the right to interpret her roles as she pleased. In the course of the battle she withdrew abruptly from scheduled leads in both "Death Takes a Holiday" and "The Animal Kingdom." These opportunities were sacrificed because she refused to recognize her director's right to set limitations on HER art. As a result of her sustained animosity to the nasty men with the megaphone, she did not break into pictures until after her Broadway smash hit, "The Warrior's Husband." RKO-Radio then gave her a five-year contract and starred her in "A Bill of Divorcement." Katharine is the daughter of a prominent Hartford, Connecticut, surgeon. She was educated at Bryn Mawr and received her first important stage opportunity as understudy for Hope Williams in a play titled "Holiday." Once runner-up for the Connecticut Women's Golf Championship, Miss Hepburn is the athletic as opposed to the "party" type of girl. She conserves the energy which she manifests so lavishly by going to bed very soon after supper. She is tall (five eight is tall for a woman), slender, with eloquent grey-green eyes and a luxurious head of auburn hair. Her next two starring vehicles will be "Portrait of a Rebel" with Herbert Marshall and "Quality Street" with your old friend, Franchot Tone.

JACKIE COOPER: Heredity and environment conspired to make an actor of Jackie Cooper. His mother a vaudeville violinist, his dad likewise a vaudevillian, and his uncle the renowned movie director, Norman Taurog. And because the stork wanted to be 100 per cent consistent, he dropped Jackie down in Los Angeles right near the studios where he was to become a little big-shot. But one thing the stork forgot was to find his little protege a high salaried job. Jackie had to start the way most of us do, right at the bottom. Five dollars was the net profit from his first screen appearance in a Lloyd Hamilton comedy. But even in those days Jackie knew that five bucks was no fortune and so he jumped at the chance to join Hal Roach's half-pint "Gangsters." This was when he was seven. At eight he was a star. Paramount cast him in the title role of "Skippy" and from then on there was no belittlin' Jackie. Nor would anyone want to in view of his later successes, such as "The Champ," "The Bowery," or "Treasure Island." Be sure to see his latest picture if you haven't already done so. It's called "The Devil Is a Sissy" and co-stars Jackie with his two pals, Freddie Bartholomew and Mickey Rooney.

GRACE STEIN, Brooklyn, New York—Henry Fonda's bride, Mrs. Frances Brokaw, has a cute little four-year-old daughter. Let's hope she likes her new daddy. Alan Jones also became a foster father when he married Irene Hervey. That makes two kids in the Jones family. Alan has a son, Theodore, by his first wife.

MARGARET SULLAVAN: It happened one night at Princeton. Watching a performance of the Tiger's amateur thespians was author Elmer Harris. Visiting artiste on the Princeton boys' home-made stage was Margaret Sullavan. Naturally her performance was elegant, and quite as naturally talent-scout Harris thought it so—or there wouldn't be any point to our story. Anyway, before the curtain was down on the last bow, Mr. Harris was backstage, and between congratulations, offered Margaret the lead in the Broadway show he had authored, "A Modern Virgin." Universal robbed the legitimate stage of her services after being enamored of her stellar work in "Dinner at Eight" in which production she shared the honors with Constance Collier and Conway Tearle. Her first picture was "Only Yesterday," followed by "Little Man What Now?" Margaret's love life has moved along in step with her career. While playing in New England stock, she met and married Henry Fonda. When Hollywood called her and left Henry back East, absence didn't seem to make her heart grow fonda. Instead poor Henry awoke one foggy morning in New York to discover that he was being sued for divorce. The divorce being granted, she was led to the altar by her director in "The Good Fairy," William Wyler. Right now she is separated from Wyler and for a while it looked as if she and Henry were drifting together again. But his recent marriage to the wealthy Mrs. Frances Seymour Brokaw should put an end to any such theories. Miss Sullavan was born in Norfolk, Va., in 1909, has blue grey eyes, brown hair, and just the trace of a southern accent. She is five foot four—stocking feet. Her last picture was "The Moon's Our Home" in which she was co-starred with her erstwhile hubby, Henry Fonda. Broadwayites will see her in George Kaufman's "Stage Door."



Special...for a Little Lady

[SPECIAL TREATMENT
...SPECIAL CARE
...EVEN A SPECIAL LAXATIVE!]

HERE WE SEE a little lady getting her regular dental examination...special care her mother seldom got when she was a girl.

One reason why children thrive better today than 20 years ago is because of special care like this. Their food...their clothes...even their playthings are specialized for them.

Your doctor will tell you that this new thinking applies to laxatives, too.

They say a child should get only a laxative made especially for children—a laxative that can't possibly harm the tiniest and most delicate infant system.

That's why so many physicians recommend Fletcher's Castoria. For here is a child's laxative pure and simple. Never do we recommend it for anyone else. Fletcher's Castoria is exceedingly mild in action. Yet it is thorough. It works chiefly on the lower bowel—not in the stomach.

Quickly and completely it clears away the waste in a baby's system...without the painful griping and digestive upsets some harsh laxatives cause. Fletcher's Castoria contains no harsh, purging drugs, no narcotics—nothing that could upset a baby's delicate system. A famous baby specialist said he couldn't write a better prescription himself!

You'll be glad to know that Fletcher's Castoria tastes good, too. Children take it willingly—without forcing. And doctors will tell you just how important that is. For often the act of forcing a child to take a laxative he hates completely upsets his entire nervous system.

So, mother, reflect a bit before you next buy a laxative for your child. Always make sure of these two important things: (1) That it's made especially for children. (2) That your child will like its taste.

More than 5,000,000 mothers keep a bottle of Fletcher's Castoria on hand, always. Why not play safe and get the economical Family-Size Bottle today? The signature Chas. H. Fletcher appears on every carton.

"And why not?" frankly explains Mrs. Rogers. "Wasn't that the best way to give Ginger a good stage presence and an assurance when she performed in public? Even then I had decided that some day Ginger would be important in Hollywood and everything we did in those years was done with that plan as the important factor."

Ginger was popular among the young generation in Forth Worth—she was a pretty, curly-haired, slender young thing with plenty of vitality, a capacity for lots of fun and the peppiest dancer in her crowd. So completely did she believe in her mother's dreams of her future fame, that she adopted Lela's attitude and followed her decisions without question. She went to parties in the town and her mother saw to it that she had a good time but Ginger was never allowed to forget that, while these social activities might be very pleasant, there was something much more important in store for her and she must not let her adolescent fancies obscure the future that Lela had already planned for her.

At that time, the Charleston was in vogue and Ginger managed to put more verve into her steps, mastering more intricacies of foot twisting to fast rhythm, than anybody else. So it was no great surprise that in a citywide contest she was awarded first prize. That led to professional engagements, but the Rogers knew that their way to Hollywood would be far more difficult if New York were not a successful stop-over en route. It was an expected thing that, sooner or later, Lela and Ginger should arrive in Manhattan. And it was not surprising that eventually Ginger should appear in a Broadway musical production, for that was what Mother Rogers wanted and this alert woman has always gotten what she wants for Ginger.

Ginger's first New York role was in a Lester Allen musical which lasted seventeen weeks, but her big success came with "Girl Crazy." During the seasons when she was and when she wasn't working on Broadway she was also appearing in pictures made at the Paramount Studios on Long Island. Certainly, if that company had realized the future gold mine in Ginger, she would have been signed to a long-term contract. But who could know then that the vogue for musical romances would result in the lucrative Astaire and Rogers team, a combination that has broken two difficult box office records at Radio City? In fact, who could have foreseen that Fred Astaire would have become the sensation he is today? Anyhow, RKO-Radio took the chance and it was "Top Hat" which really brought this popular pair to the summit of their own efforts. No succeeding vehicle has ever reached the class of that outstanding production, but they've all made plenty of money for the stars and the producers.

However, before the Rogers trekked westward to the cinema citadel, there were many times when both almost believed that they had aimed too high, for while Ginger worked as seriously as her mother planned, things did not come so quickly that there were not dark moments which made success seem far away. It was during these periods, as Ginger and her mother now admit, when Ginger stuck only because the plans had been laid so long and Lela Rogers would not give up faith in her daughter's ultimate fame.

WITH the recent "Swing Time" picture which drew 11,000 people into Radio City before two o'clock in the afternoon, the day the film opened, and which broke all box office records for a first day engagement, Ginger essayed dramatic moments in between dances. Mrs. Rogers thought her offspring did right well with her sober mien for the cameras.

Quite frankly, between sips of coffee in her New York hotel, the morning after the opening, Mrs. Rogers said, "In fact, Ginger made such an effort to be dramatic that I think she leaned over backwards a little, don't you? She has a lot to learn if she is to duplicate her dancing success in serious roles. It will be like starting all over again, but I am confident she can do it. She already has improved tremendously. You know, it takes fifteen pictures for a player to really find herself on the screen and Ginger has appeared in more films than that. However, the public will only take so many doses of any one kind of entertainment, then it wants something new."

It is a little difficult to imagine Ginger Rogers without any big dance numbers and there are some who do not believe that she ever can reach a screen importance in drama equal to her unusual success teamed with Astaire. But as her mother confidently details the plans for a serious screen Ginger, who will deal out emotion instead of rhythm, you have a feeling that where Ginger is concerned, Mother Rogers cannot be so far wrong. The record to date is the best proof that she "knows best" for her daughter.

Ginger and her mother weren't as pleased with "Swing Time" as with others of her vehicles. In discussing this picture, Mrs. Rogers emphasized that, while both Ginger and Fred Astaire gave better performances, the score could not compare with "Top Hat." She was surprised a little at the enthusiasm of the New York critics.

"It only goes to show what they know," she remarked, and she said the best review was that of one male critic who had picked out all the flaws.

"The next picture better be good," she exclaimed vehemently, meaning the vehicle and not the acting. But, as she added, the Gershwins are working on the music and the Rogers hopes are high. She also believes that Astaire has undeveloped dramatic possibilities. "I'd like to see them give Freddy a part without music and dancing. If they would only forget what a great dancer he is and let him be serious on the screen, he would surprise everybody."

Ginger looks more attractive now than at any time since she became a film star. She screens better, too, but that's only because they both feel the studio has learned to light her better on the set. Her hair has more of a reddish gold tint and even away from work she wears long lashes that emphasize the depth of her dark eyes. It is significant that, although this slight, pretty young actress has had two unsuccessful matrimonial experiences, at no time has Mrs. Rogers relinquished her place at the helm.

Ginger does the acting but Lela takes care of the business. Why even when the star is being interviewed, you can ask her the questions but her mother will make the important answers. Ginger has such complete confidence in her mother's ability to manage her career that she never questions the older woman's decision.

When they first went to Hollywood, Mrs. Rogers was on the set all day and the young actress never made a gesture or spoke a line without advice from her. "In the past few years, however, Ginger has learned to take care of herself. She doesn't need me so much in her work and I leave her acting to her own judgment."

But the slender, blue-eyed, sharp blonde Lela Rogers, who can show seasoned veterans of the Hollywood contract campaigns some smart tricks in getting what she wants on a picture deal, could not content herself with any leisure hours. So last year, the studio gave her some embryonic contract talent in the way of a stock company, a fat weekly salary and a theatre on the lot which seats 250, then told her to turn out screen players. All the newly-signed troupers attend her acting school.

Results in her school, Mrs. Rogers claims, are more fortunate than in other studios where talent is signed every week or so and dropped when option time comes up, sometimes with hardly a screen appearance to show for the contract. Hollywood, she says, is starving for new faces.

"They haven't developed a single new or outstanding personality from among the younger untried recruits in five years," she says. "There's no unusually promising star material which can move up to the front rank to tomorrow's stardom when the public gets tired of seeing the celebrities who are now the big box office draws."

Conversation, wherever the Rogers are, always comes back to Ginger and Ginger's future. A few months ago the studio took out a million dollars worth of insurance on Ginger, for their own protection, and it is Lela Rogers' unfaltering purpose to keep her daughter's status in that class.

THE fortunate think is that Ginger is perfectly content with the present situation—neither a husband nor a friend can interrupt that arrangement. Ginger talks about her clothes, about Hollywood parties, about other pictures she has seen, or plays she has attended. She'll even dwell lightly on a new beau, but when it comes to anything important about her career, she looks confidently at her mother and lets her make the right answers.

Ginger likes a feminine wardrobe of soft materials, fluffily designed. Her mother usually leaves decision on such matters to Ginger and, during their recent vacation in New York, all the star's early afternoons were spent with dressmakers and milliners. She took back with her a flock of dresses and hats and furs that would have seemed like a Cinderella dream in the pre-movie days.

The Rogers were very unofficial about their Manhattan holiday and were quite inaccessible to the home offices. They stopped at a Park Avenue hotel and the publicity department didn't catch up with them until they'd been doing the popular places for a week.

"It took detectives to find us even then," Mrs. Rogers boasted.

On the morning of their return to Hollywood, Ginger was dressing while frantically trying to keep half a dozen appointments, all connected with her wardrobe. Lela was packing innumerable bags and trunks, with only a few hours to finish the job. She was drinking coffee at fifteen minute intervals and helping Ginger. She dismisses as casual topics any new romances for Ginger. In Lela Rogers' eyes, while she obviously can't keep her daughter from falling in love or thinking she is, anything in the world is of minor importance compared to Ginger's work. The pretty Ginger listens with a docile manner that is a perfect "Mother knows best" attitude.

"I hate my neck. It's set funny on my shoulders. I look like an antelope.

"I hate my eyebrows. They don't arch as they should. My little Susan's brows arch beautifully and naturally and I've always wished mine did, but they don't.

"And I have big ears. See? Oh, don't look so politely incredulous, you know they're big. Why, I have to keep my hair over them when I go to bed at night so they won't get cold. And I never can wear my hair slicked back off my ears as I'd like to wear it.

"These are just a few of my worst points. And knowing them as well as I do, you can't expect me to smile with smug self-satisfaction, taking the accolade of beauty for my own.

"And I don't want it, anyway. I want to be a human being, not a mannikin or a bisque doll. I'd like to be an actress, not a show-girl. I think it hurts a girl to be dubbed a beauty—it can be a decided liability and not an asset. I . . ."

"Just the same," I interrupted, "you are known as a beauty. The swains of the town go about mooning over you. So what are you going to do about it?"

"I do do things about it," said Virginia with spirit. "I'll tell you what I do specifically in just a minute. I know what people say. Everyone in Hollywood gets labeled. One girl will be known for the-most-beautiful-legs-in-the-world. And she has to all but break them before she can get her face in front of the camera.

"Someone, in an expansive moment, thinks it would be good publicity to call a girl 'a beauty' and the poor thing would have to get small-pox to break away from the label.

IT'S stultifying to be known as a beauty—it's impoverishing. You run the risk of being cast as some sort of show-girl or mannikin for the rest of your days.

"Think of most of the beautiful show girls you've ever known—such beauties as took your breath away just to look at them. Have any of them become Katharine Cornells, Helen Hayes', or Lynn Fontannes? They have not. And they haven't mostly because they haven't tried. A beautiful woman has a brain in her head just as a plain woman has. The difference is that the beautiful woman usually doesn't make an effort to develop that brain. She doesn't think she has to use it. Beauties begin to believe, early in life and with reason, that all they have to do is to be beautiful and that the riches, fame and gifts of the world will be poured into their laps. For a time that's just what does happen. And then, perhaps, their beauty begins to dim—or other, younger beauties come their way. And where are they? What are they?

"I really suppose," said Virginia, moving her feet so that Bob Montgomery wouldn't trip over them, which he tried his darndest to do as he came down the path, "I suppose your question 'Is beauty a boomerang?' is well taken—even though you have put it to the wrong girl.

"And my answer is, 'Yes, it is.' I should say that even the girl in a small town, who has the reputation of being the prettiest girl, is to be pitied. A label like that is like sky-rockets that last a little while and then it dies down and the girl 'dies,' too. I think it is a far happier and more enviable state to be born just average good looking so that you have to work hard to develop your personality, your talents, even your looks. There is a quality of earnestness about girls who are not known as beauties, which beauties never have.

"It's bad for a girl's personal life, too. I know that the girl, who is called the prettiest girl in town, doesn't have half the fun that the regular, all-round tomboy sort of girl has. Boys aren't afraid of the regular girl. They take her everywhere. They are comfortable with her and believe me, I think men care a lot more about comfort than they do about charm. And when a girl is known as a beauty, other girls don't like her. Maybe they're jealous of her, maybe she doesn't make an effort to be chummy and interesting. She doesn't, perhaps, 'give' anything. Girls who are famous beauties feel, because they are made to feel that way, that if they give the world the privilege of gazing upon them that's all that is expected of them. It isn't.

"Anyway, they are very lonely people, I think. They have few girl-friends. Perhaps, at first, they don't feel the need of girl-friends, having so many beaux. But even the beaux don't give them an awful lot of fun, to my way of thinking. They don't take them on big parties any oftener than they have to. Perhaps they're jealous, too, and want to keep them to themselves. Whatever the reason, the prettiest girl doesn't get to go on straw-rides, picnics, and such things because the boys think that she would be too grand for such goings-on.

"I honestly believe," said Virginia seriously, "that beauty often keeps men away from girls. I mean the beauty that is publicized, that is spelt with a capital 'B.' And I mean nice, regular men, the kind of men girls should get to meet and to marry. Oh, men take great beauties out, of course. To show what big-shots they are, to show the girls off. But usually these men are not the marrying men. The nice men, those who want wives, homes and families are afraid of beauties. They feel they haven't the money for orchids and the de luxe cars which they have been taught to believe great beauties expect. They can't afford to go often to the de luxe night spots. And so, the poor 'celebrated beauty' misses out on a lot of fun and—which is more serious—doesn't get to meet the fine, regular men she might love and marry.

MEN, except for occasional bursts of exhibitionism, don't want to be the taggers-on after any woman, however beautiful—not for long, not until death do them part. They don't want to spend their lives standing on the edge of a spotlight occupied by a dazzling wife. They are too practical. They wonder what kind of a home life they would have with a 'Bird of Paradise' at the helm."

"Well," I said, "what do you do about it?"

"Stop that!" laughed Virginia. "Do I have to lay bare my private life in order to prove to you that I am not what a few zealous press agents and youths have wished on me?

"Listen, I know this great beauty business has been noised abroad about me. And so I do everything I can to break it down. I go out riding with boys, with my brother Stan and his friends, for instance. I invite myself to go with them in their open flivvers with the tops down. We go to hamburger stands along the road and down to Venice Pier and, believe me, when we come home none of those lads is thinking of me as any beauty. I have fun with them and they know it. I don't care whether my hair is on my head or in my eyes—and neither do they.

"I live the most family kind of life that ever was. I had to rent my house on Toluca Lake because there really wasn't room for all of us. You see, there are my mother and dad, the baby and her nurse, my brother and I. And then we have lots of the family out here, too. My grandparents, who have lived here for twenty-five years, aunts and uncles—and all of them are at the house a lot of the time. On the nights when I don't go out, and there are quite a few of those, I make fudge in the kitchen with Stan and some of his friends—or my mother plays the piano and I sing, we harmonize old songs together. I like to go to bed and read; it is one of my very favorite pastimes.

I always put the baby to bed and hear her prayers. I wouldn't miss that time with her for anything. And she says such darling prayers," Virginia said, her blue eyes very tender. "Lately, she starts by saying 'God bless God' and then next comes always, 'God bless Daddy,' and then the whole family is mentioned, carefully, one by one—including the pets and the toys.

"I knit for the baby. I've knitted a few things for myself. I do not spend hours going through a ritual of cold cream, massages and astringents before I go to bed. I was brought up, in North Dakota, to wash my face and hands, say my prayers and go to bed. And I still do just that.

"There are so many of us at home," laughed Virginia, "that we've had to draw up a 'Table of Resolutions'—we just compiled one, had it typed and now it stands in the front hall of our new house in Brentwood for all the Bruces to read.

"It's headed 'Resolutions for the Bruce Family'—and here are some of 'em:

"Never let the puppy out at night—this is necessary because someone always comes in late who does let him out and then there is a grand to-do in the morning trying to find him.

"Keep one garage door open at night—and that's necessary because Stan, or dad, or I come in late and invariably find that the first one in has efficiently closed and barred the doors.

"Leave closet windows in fur closet open—and that's because dad has a mania for going about, closing and locking all of the windows in the house so one of these days my furs are going to be rendered unto the moths because of it.

"Turn off lights under baby's sleeping porch—and that's because of another mania of dad's, bless him—he thinks lights should be left on all night long so the one under the baby's sleeping porch is apt to be left on and when it is, the term sleeping porch doesn't quite apply, if you know what I mean!"

I did know what she meant. And Virginia by then had given proof positive that she does not fancy herself as a great beauty, that she does everything within her power to escape the curse of being one. For, whoever heard of a G.B. riding about in topless flivvers, making fudge, worrying about garage doors and whether the puppy is in or out?

"There is a quality of earnestness about girls who are not known as beauties," Virginia had said, "which beauties never have. . . ."

Right there is the reason for her real beauty. She is honest. She does make an effort to please. Women do like her. She develops her mind and her abilities. She has that "quality of earnestness."

Yet, alas, Virginia! I am afraid you are doomed to beauty for the rest of your life. Because beauty that comes from a warm spirit and an honest heart is a perennial bloom.

Bob Taylor's True Life Story

her Camille. At the most, she may be a touch temperamental—but that didn't do me any harm.

"So, I've gone over this past year of mine, this incredible year, step by step. I've torn it to shreds, analyzed every step of the way for publication. But—I've never told anyone my reason for believing that I'll never be spoiled. No, not even if the Taylor star keeps on rising instead of falling, as it well may do. And I've got my reasons, believe me—but hold on a bit, there's some one giving me the high sign, I'll be right back."

"Barbara," Bob said on his return to me, speaking of Barbara Stanwyck, "is the grandest actress in the world, one of the great women of this century. You've got something to work with when you work with Barbara as I did in 'His Brother's Wife.' D'you know, she can turn on the tears the instant the scene or the line calls for them. I can work up tears, too, but I have to have time for it. It's a matter of technique, of course, and Barbara has her technique so beautifully controlled, her emotions so lightly but firmly harnessed that she can leash and unleash them on tap. She's an actress." And aside he said, "Mamo, don't bother any more now, thanks a million—I feel like a new man."

BOB continued, "And now for my reasons why I'm sure I'll never be spoiled. My reasons are—my parents, my home life and my young boyhood. I am an only child, as you know, and my parents thought pretty well of me. I was, naturally, the star on the home lot. Mainly because there was no one else in the cast. And so I was accustomed, from infancy, to being the one king-pin on the lot. And that stands me in good stead now. Because, having been the king-pin all of my life, being one of the king-pins in Hollywood, even if I were, wouldn't go to my head now. I'm used to it.

"And, although I was an only child and my parents rather fancied me, they made me toe the line—and how! I was taught to respect them and my home. I understood vested authority at an early age.

"I was spanked when I deserved it. Not often, but when Dad said he would spank me—he did. And if I may begin, at any early date, giving advice to young mothers and fathers I would say what has been said before—spare the rod and you will spoil the child—and you will run a perfectly magnificent chance of spoiling the star!

"What I mean is, my Dad never pulled his punches. He never threatened to spank me only to forget it or back down on it. I knew that if I did the things I shouldn't do, I would get the licking and there would be no forgetfulness on my father's part, no alibi accepted, no stalling, no reprieve.

"And believe me, that stands me in good stead now. It taught me to be darned certain that a misdeed on my part will be followed by punishment. I still feel sure that no alibi will help me out. I know that life doesn't stall.

"You see," Bob said, with that seriousness which gives his youth maturity, his eyes their depth and his smile its gravity, "a boy's parents constitute life for him. And if the parents act in accordance with the underlying, sound principles of life, a boy is pretty apt to know what to expect and behaves accordingly.

"Then, too, my parents placed trust in me. They expected me to behave decently and honorably. And because they expected me to, I think I can say that, for the most part, I always did.

"The analogy can be drawn right along. For now, the studio seems to have placed trust in me, seems to expect me to behave decently and honorably, to turn in a 'good performance.' And because they expect me to, I'll try like the deuce.

"When I was a little shaver of ten or twelve, I'd be allowed to take my bike or my horse and ride for miles around the country without boundary lines or restraints. I could even ride to a neighboring town, if I felt like it, and spend the night in a local hostelry or with some boy friend. And there were no questions asked at home. People usually walk a fairly straight line, I've found, when they're not being prodded in the ribs every five minutes.

"And that all helps, too, now. Because I was raised in the belief that I was answerable for my own actions, I still realize keenly that what I do or do not do is my own picnic or my own funeral.

"Every little decision that had to be made in my young life, I made. When I wanted a musical instrument and couldn't make up my mind whether I wanted a banjo, a cello or a saxophone the most, I got no help at home. I had to make my own choice and knew I'd have to abide by it. I wanted," smiled Bob, "a saxophone.

"When it came time for me to go to college, I had the choice of going to Northwestern University by myself to study dramatics—or I could go to Doane with my pal, Gerry Wieber. Dad couldn't afford to send both of us to Northwestern. It was a momentous decision in my life at the time. But I had to make it alone. I went to Doane with Gerry.

"My father instilled into me, very early, the grave importance of punctuality. He was a doctor, you know, and he used to tell me that Life and Death wait for no man—or his watch! When he had to attend a birth or to see a man out on his last journey he had to be there on time, or else. Lack of punctuality on my part was always attended with drastic results. And there weren't any excuses accepted. I couldn't say, 'I didn't know what time it was or that my watch was fast or slow.' I was told that those were no excuses at all, that it was my business to know the time and to have my watch set right.

"And I'm grateful for that training now," Bob said. "At least, I won't be the type of 'spoiled star' who strolls nonchalantly onto a set anywhere from fifteen minutes to an hour and a half late, believing that he can be late by divine right or something. I'm always on the set at least half an hour before anyone else. In fact, I'm the sound-stage-opener-upper of the studio.

THEN, there's this—I always had more than the other boys in my home town. And this, too, proves to be a safeguard against the danger of being spoiled by Hollywood, its money or its luxury. Because I never knew what it was to want for anything I didn't have, I'm not bowled over by having more than I need now.

"I had a bike before any kid in the neighborhood had one. I had a horse of my own when none of the other fellows had one. I had a car long before anyone else. I always had more clothes, more spending money, more gadgets of all kinds than other fellows my age. And so, having more clothes, more spending money and more gadgets now doesn't go to my head. I'm used to it, comparatively speaking.

"And just as people back home used to say to me, 'What a swell bike, aren't you the one to have a horse' and so on—so, now, people say to me, 'What a swell car, aren't you the one to be a moom picture star' and so on.

"I never got much flattery at home. It was my parents' idea that a chap was supposed to do his job well—why not? I knew when they were pleased and I knew darned well when they were displeased; few words were wasted either way.

"Perhaps that's why flattery never meant very much to me. They say that diet shrinks the stomach. Well, a diet of no flattery shrinks the taste for flattery, too. And such doses of sugar as I did occasionally get from friends and neighbors, always made me feel self-conscious and embarrassed. I've never had any come-back to compliments. I've always felt like a chump when people praise me. I hope I continue in the same way. For when I begin to smile smugly, when I come back at a flowery speech with a smooth nifty, I'll know that it's time to call in the movie morticians!

"There's another angle, too, to this business of my having had so much when I was a kid. It seemed, at the time, to work against me. For, naturally, other kids resented my having more than they did. They were disposed to ride me for it. And I had to work like the devil to make friends. I had to work like a dog to prove to them that I was at least regular even if I did ride a horse while they walked, even if I did have ten bucks to their one.

"It's the same now. I still work like the devil to make friends—and for much the same reasons. I don't imagine any chap tries harder than I do to be friendly. I still feel that I must bend over backwards to try to convince other fellows that I am at least regular, even if I do happen to be a movie actor.

"And I like to be friends with all kinds of fellows. Just as my Dad used to have the time of his life hob-nobbing with the Nebraskan farmers, as well as with other doctors, lawyers and town bankers—so I like to be friends with garage men, the electricians, sound men and all kinds, as well as my fellow actors.

"And this, too, stands me in good stead. For I certainly don't think I give the impression of expecting people to touch their foreheads to the ground when I approach. On the contrary, I always feel that it's going to be a tough job to make people like me.

"I'm not demonstrative. I can't show my feelings easily. Which also should prevent me from making an ass of myself. Because I can't 'show off!'"

And I know that that is true. For I saw Bob and Barbara at the Grove one night a week or so ago. They dined and talked so quietly, they danced so unobtrusively—Barbara in a tailored suit, Bob in dark clothes—that, unless you were face to face with them, you would never have known they were there.

"I'm like my mother in this respect," Bob was saying. "She never can show her feelings, either. A week or so ago, on her birthday, I gave her a diamond bracelet. I knew she had always been crazy about diamonds—women are. Back in Nebraska only multi-millionaires and the people you read about in the Sunday Supplements have diamonds. I had an idea that mother had always had a secret hankering for the things, even though she never would have dreamed of mentioning anything so fantastic. Anyway, for the kick I thought it might give her, I handed her the box on her birthday. She opened it all unsuspecting, and there was the diamond bracelet!

"And what did she do? Nothing. Not a trace of emotion crossed her face. She didn't laugh; she didn't cry. She just sat there. And then she said, very quietly, 'Oh, Buddy'—and that was all, then or later. But Barbara and I, who were watching her, both felt a sort of chill go up and down our spines because we understood what she was feeling."

And I may say that I felt a sort of chill go up and down my spine too, as Bob told this little tale about his mother. For I could imagine, can't you, what his mother's real thrill must have been when this boy of hers, so able now to buy her diamonds, actually remembered to buy them?

I think the depth of her thrill must have been, not so much his ability to buy them, as his boyishness in doing it.

"I know how she felt," Bob said, "because I am so much the same. Diamonds, you might say, have been laid in my lap. Certainly when I went to Pomona College I had no idea of what was in store for me. I thought that earning my own living had better be in store for me, since Dad had just passed away, but I hardly expected such a 'living' as this!

"Naturally—and between you and me—I get such a wallop out of it as beggars description. I can't believe it. I go into huddles with myself and have a fit. But I can't show how I feel about it—and that's all to the good. For if I did, I might be put down as an exhibitionist. At least," said Bob, with his frank smile, "if I do 'spoil,' I'll spoil quietly!"

Even if you knew none of the specific details of Bob Taylor's early life, these experiences, so vividly related by him, tell you what has made him the modest, likeable chap he still is today. You feel the solid, sensible background of his boyhood in Beatrice, Nebraska. You feel the kind but authoritative influence of his father, Dr. Brugh, who, as a busy country doctor, had no patience with a boy who didn't show character and a democratic spirit. Even though Dr. Brugh and his wife gave Bob advantages that some of the other local boys did not have, they never allowed him to feel he was different or superior. He attended public school and got the average bumps and boosts that most kids get along the way. And when, while still in college, his father died, he stepped into family responsibilities that would have had a maturing effect upon him even if he had been a giddy youth, which he wasn't.

"And as for 'girl-trouble'—well, I've always been used to being with girls," he continued. "Doane was co-ed, so is Pomona. And the prettiest girls on the campus were, speaking relatively again, of the same glamor to me as the biggest stars in Hollywood are to me right now. I've always gone out with girls, though always with one girl at a time.

"I don't like double dates. I detest crowds and big parties. I like to go out, as Barbara and I do, by ourselves, to dine and dance and talk.

"But certainly, I did not grow to manhood in a womanless world. I always worked side by side with girls in college, competed with them, shared mutual problems with them, took them dancing in the evenings. I work with girls in pictures now, share mutual problems with them, take them dancing in the evening. Now, instead of taking 'my girl' to a fraternity or a sorority dance I take 'my girl' to the Grove or to the Beverly Wilshire or somewhere. That's the only difference. I've really gone out with only two girls since I first came to Hollywood. I don't think I can be said to have gone goofy in the girl direction."

And no one can say that he has. When he first came to Hollywood, he went about with Irene Hervey to the exclusion of all others. And when Irene and he drifted apart, Irene finally marrying Allan Jones, Bob started to beau Barbara Stanwyck about.

Certainly a young man with the world at his feet, couldn't have a more down-to-earth person for a sweetheart than Barbara. She has known hard work and unhappiness despite her youth, and she has never been a part of Hollywood's gayer life. She's a realist and a girl whose head will never be turned. Their whole romance has been so quiet and real, too.

If they do marry, which the rumor hounds insist they will, you can depend upon it that both will be truly in love and that their marriage will have dignity and the simple, homely virtues which made up Bob's background in Nebraska.

The director was giving the signal for another take, so Bob said goodbye.

And watching the boy thousands of fans call, "The handsomest man I have ever seen," I thought how truly you could say, "Back of every great man are great parents." I knew that Bob had given the real reason and the sound one for why he is not spoiled, nor will be.

Turns," she protested that no mid-western farm girl would have so many dresses as that. If she was going to portray a farm girl, why couldn't she portray one realistically?

FINALLY she began to complain that the studio was shoving her ahead too fast and putting her into too many pictures.

Shortly after she made "Midsummer Night's Dream," she said, "I've been made a star too soon and I'm just miserable about the whole business. When I went on the stage, I hoped that it would take me ten years to arrive."

I knew that a few years previously Jean had lived in a cheap basement apartment in New York and had tramped from agency to agency begging for a job. Hollywood had thrown out a life-line when she was broke and desperate, thin and undernourished, and when all that stood between herself and failure was twenty dollars.

And yet she dared to complain that Hollywood was smashing her artistic standards.

"Now," she said drearily, her voice tragic and poignant, "I'm afraid I'll never be as competent an actress as I had hoped to be. I can't go back to Broadway and play tiny bits, getting the long apprenticeship which I should have had before I came to Hollywood. And, because of that, I'm afraid I'll never get to the top, never really amount to anything as an actress. Today young actresses are starred too soon. It isn't only I; it's the host of young people who come to Hollywood."

On the surface this might sound like humility, but actually it was another example of Jean's belief that in Hollywood things are never done as well as they are on the stage. She had accepted a Hollywood contract, not because she wanted to be in pictures, but to save herself from starvation. Always her thoughts were of what-might-have-been, of the career she might have had on the stage if she hadn't gone to Hollywood. She has since said of this period in her life, "I was terribly afraid the movies were going to take away from me the ideals Constance Collier had taught me and substitute in some way the ideals of Jimmy Durante."

Even when the studio sent her to New York to get additional publicity for "Midsummer Night's Dream," she objected.

"What point is there to all this silly ballyhoo?" she wanted to know. "All the ballyhoo in the world won't make 'Midsummer Night's Dream' a better picture than it already is."

Warners, more than a little weary of her critical attitude, sent her to their studio in England where she made "Faithful," a picture so unimportant that it never was released in this country.

Jean came back from England as superior as ever in her attitude toward the movies. As evidence of this, she threw herself heart and soul into the Theatre Workshop, which she had started as a training school for young people. Here were taught not only acting, but directing, scenic designing and every other phase of the theatre. Though the Theatre Workshop had supposedly been started as a hobby, Jean seemed more interested in it than in her movie career.

Now matters took an ironic turn. Since Jean had complained that she was being shoved ahead too fast and put into the wrong roles, her studio decided to give her a taste of a different sort of treatment.

Month after month went by and Jean was not cast in any pictures at all. She ate the bitter bread of idleness, She, who had received so much adulation, was now thrust in a corner like an old shoe.

She still had her Theatre Workshop, but she found it was not enough. For the first time in her career Jean knew what it meant to be completely ignored. And Hollywood, quick to realize that the cold wind of her studio's displeasure was blowing on Jean, behaved toward her with indifference. People whom she had hurt now got their chance to hurt her. Jean was going through that particular hell that is reserved in Hollywood for those who are beginning to slip.

BUT Hollywood still held in reserve one final blow to Jean's pride. After months of idleness, Jean was farmed out for "White Fang." Her role was stupid and unimportant, the kind she would have turned her back on only a few months ago. And the picture itself was just an

DON'T LET ADOLESCENT PIMPLES MAKE YOU HATE TO BE SEEN

PIMPLES spoil many a "date"—for boys as well as girls—after the start of adolescence, from about 13 to 25 years of age, or even longer.

At this time, important glands develop and final growth takes place. The entire system is disturbed. The skin gets extra sensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin. Then, unsightly pimples pop out.

Fleischmann's Yeast clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Then, pimples go! Eat 3 cakes each day, one before meals—plain, or in a little water—until skin clears.

Jean knew she was being sold down the river. But months of idleness had taught her humility. She realized what a fool she had been to be so critical and carping in her attitude toward Hollywood. And so she accepted the part. Nor has she rebelled against the roles which have followed at her home studio, though they are not exceptional.

"Jean's attitude has changed completely," a studio publicity man told me. "She's no longer superior and critical toward movies. She now intends to concentrate on her movie career, and she probably will not re-open her Theatre Workshop."

Jean isn't altogether to blame for her attitude toward Hollywood. Everything in her life conspired to make her too outspoken for her own good, too agressive to be popular.

From the time she was a small child, Jean Muir was brought up by her parents not to believe anything, not to accept anything, until she had proved it to her own satisfaction. They refused to lay down the law to this child of theirs. They told her that she must make up her own mind about religion, about her home, about what she wanted out of life. They would have preferred to give her hand-me-down clothes, if that ever had been necessary, rather than hand-me-down ideas. "Find out for yourself," was the core and heart of all they taught her. "Stand on your own two feet. Use your own mind."

Because she grew up so free and unfettered, Jean made many enemies, even as a child. Accustomed to being the queen bee in her own home, she insisted on dominating the children with whom she played. When they played school, she wanted to be the teacher. Sometimes she turned her backyard into an imaginary court of the Arthurian legends. Then the children came in and played with her, till she herself drove them away by her insistence on always playing the star role.

Lonely and miserable at school, Jean was delighted when her father suggested that she go abroad to visit his people in Scotland. But even there she didn't find happiness. Even there, she was still buried in her own loneliness, her unfortunate absorption in her own personality. So she went to the Sorbonne in France. And there her loneliness was increased tenfold, for she didn't even speak the same language as the other girls.

In her wretchedness she sought some escape, and decided this time that she could find it by studying dramatic art. At once she wrote her parents, telling them that she wanted to give up her courses at the Sorbonne and study for the stage.

You might imagine that they, who had never opposed Jean before, would have written to her now to go on and do as she pleased. But they didn't. "Of course," wrote Jean's mother, "you can go ahead and do what you think best, but do you want to give up something that you have started? Do you want to quit in midstream?"

When it was put that way to her, Jean Muir saw only one answer. She had been called all sorts of things in her life, but never a quitter. And she wasn't going to be one now. Or ever!

When she finally left the Sorbonne, she spoke French like a native. You know what happened after that, how through an accident she met the English company of "Bird in Hand" which was going to America on the same boat as she. To learn something about the stage, she offered to work for nothing as an understudy, and they accepted her. But that was the first and last time that accident played a part in determining her career. After that, Jean fought and slaved for success.

"I found a small room in New York for three dollars a week," she told me. "It was ugly and dirty, and cockroaches swarmed all over the place. I couldn't stand that, so I moved into another place for three and a half dollars a week. That was tiny but it was clean, and from there I laid siege to all the producers' offices."

CARRYING her best pair of shoes in a package and wearing Indian moccasins, Jean Muir tramped from one office to another. As soon as she came to any office, she put on her high-heeled shoes and, thus fortified, walked in to see the producers. Incredible? Jean Muir assured me it was true, and no one in Hollywood has ever known her to lie.

Even in those days she was unusual. Though she was living on six dollars a week, though she was cold and hungry and undernourished, she dreamed of the day when she would be able to stage her own plays. One day she decided to go to the Metropolitan Museum of Art to do some research work on the costuming for a certain play. Examining her meager store of money, she found that she had only a dime for carfare. That was enough to take her to the Museum and back by subway. But Jean hated the subway! Instead, she walked sixty blocks to the Museum and squandered her ten cents on a bus to take her home.

She was like a little girl in her worship of the stage and of the great stage actresses. There was the time, for instance, when Jean met Ethel Barrymore for the first time. When Miss Barrymore offered Jean a cigarette, Jean reached forward to take it. But she was so upset by the thrill of meeting this woman, who was the toast of two continents, that her hand began to tremble. Embarrassed at showing her emotions, Jean quickly withdrew her hand, and refused the cigarette.

"You don't smoke?" said Miss Barrymore, smiling. "That's fine, child. Smoking is bad for your voice."

From that day to this Jean has never touched a cigarette.

Usually Jean was lucky if she managed to get a three-line part in a play. But by unwearying persistence, by unending calls on managers, she finally got her first important role, as Helen Menken's mad sister in "Saint Wench." This was her big chance! Remembering how often she had prayed and hoped for such a chance, she drove herself on and on, till her body could hardly stand the grinding routine that she demanded of herself. Then came the opening night! The play opened to the worst notices that any play had ever received in New York!

"Saint Wench" ran a week, and then closed down. When Warners offered Jean a contract, she had been out of work for three months. No wonder she said, "You must be crazy to want me!" But a scout of theirs had seen her in "Saint Wench" and decided she had possibilities; some one else dug up an old movie test she had taken with Franchot Tone and was impressed by her work.

Because she had to fight every inch of the way to get ahead on the stage, Jean Muir pursued the same tactics in Hollywood. "I believed that the way to get ahead was to push and to pound," she told me, "so I pushed and I pounded."

But eventually Jean discovered that in Hollywood diplomacy is more important than frankness, reserve more important than honesty.

Most important of all she learned humility, and in her humility she is greater than she ever was when she was arrogant.

"You know, I've been a juvenile for so long, and for just that long I've wanted, longed, to be grown up. Of course, I've lied about my age for ages, pretended to be older than I was in order to get work, and have said I was twenty-one for the past five years. When I actually became twenty-one, it was a sort of anti-climax to my friends. But to me it was important. It was a milestone. I thought I would put on a role of dignity like I would my overcoat, that people would suddenly realize that I was grown up and treat me with respect.

"I looked forward to the time when I could vote, swaggering up to the polls to cast my vote for President of the United States with a pipe in my mouth. Now that I'm old enough to vote, I was working so hard on a picture that I forgot to register and I can't vote.

"I always thought I would be married by the time I was of age and pictured myself the head of a family and I quite fancied myself ordering servants around and being the man of the house. I took it as a matter of course that I would marry Anita Louise. She's the only girl I've ever been in love with. Now that that's all over, I haven't fallen in love with anyone else, but I'd still like to get married. I'm a one-woman man," he added seriously. "You never hear of me flirting around with this girl and that. I want to be in love with one girl and be married to her for the rest of my life."

He looked so in earnest that I couldn't help but believe him.

"But part of my hopes are coming true soon," he continued. "I'm going to have my own home. By that time my father and mother will be set financially. They are going to build a home for themselves and I'm going to live alone. Of course, I'll be running over to their house all the time and probably spend more time with them than I will in my own place, but I'll know that I have a place that will be just mine," he said with a great deal of satisfaction.

"It will be hard on the folks and hard on me, too," he admitted, "but I think it is the right thing to do."

WHAT a wrench it will be for Tom to leave home, the home his parents have built around him, the home where he has had the best chance in the world to become a spoiled brat—but hasn't—only his intimates can understand. It will be hard for him to give up his bedroom, which he planned and for which he designed every stick of furniture, but he will have to, "because I'm going to live in an apartment at first," he explained.

Tom runs rather to the nautical in a great many ways and in decorating his bedroom he went completely berserk. Everything is designed to make you think you are on a ship. The footboard on his bed is made of carved anchors. There are ship's ropes around everything—a ship's bell and clock and the pictures on the walls are in frames made to represent life preservers. There are imitation portholes, in which rare tropical fish swim about.

"I have to make the break some time," he sighed, "and it might as well be now. My father and mother have their own friends, but they neglect them for me. I'm an only child and they are all wrapped up in me and in everything I do. They make their plans around me and it isn't right. Most of all, I want to learn to rely on myself. I'm getting to the point where

...on the dangerous reef of half-truths about feminine hygiene. "Lysol" has prevented many such tragedies.

MILLIONS of women today have discovered a vitally important fact about feminine hygiene. They have learned that "Lysol" has six special qualities which make it uniquely valuable, combined with such dependability and gentleness that doctors commonly use it in one of the most delicate of all operations ...childbirth.

Not liking to discuss such a delicate subject as feminine hygiene is natural...but when misinformation, ignorance, and half-truths threaten happiness, a wife is guilty of serious neglect if she fails to learn that there is a reliable answer to her problem.

You will find that "Lysol" gives you a new sense of antiseptic cleanliness that is most reassuring. But more important, "Lysol" brings the poise and peace of mind so essential to a truly happy marriage.

The 6 Special Features of "Lysol"

1. NON-CAUSTIC..."Lysol" in the proper dilutions is gentle and reliable. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.
2. EFFECTIVENESS..."Lysol" is a true germicide, active under practical conditions...even in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.). Some other preparations don't work under these conditions.
3. PENETRATION..."Lysol" solutions spread because of their low surface tension—and thus virtually search out germs.
4. ECONOMY..."Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs less than one cent an application in the proper solution for feminine hygiene.
5. ODOR...The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears very soon after use.
6. STABILITY...Keeps its full strength, no matter how long kept, or how often uncorked.

I have no faith in my own ability to make decisions, just because I've always depended on them to make my decisions for me. I unconsciously turn to them for everything and it's time I learned to make up my own mind, in order to be a worthwhile person.

"Another reason I want my own place is so I can entertain more freely. Oh, don't laugh now," he said, "I'm all over that stuff of wanting gay parties. But if I have company at the house and we start singing at midnight, I worry about keeping the folks awake.

YOU know, in this game you have to do a certain amount of entertaining for business reasons. I don't mean inviting 'the right people' or the social climbing angle. But just suppose I'm cast in a new picture. I get the script and I read it. Well, if I happen to meet the director at the studio I can ask him up to the house for dinner and it gives us a chance to get acquainted and gives me an opportunity to find out what his idea of my role is. Often I've started a picture under a director I never met until the day I began to work for him, and naturally I had no idea what he expected of me. It makes things easier if you have a chance to get acquainted first. But that's just one angle.

"I've been going around with an older crowd lately and I'm learning a lot. I may not be as intelligent as they are, but I've got sense enough to know when I'm out of my class and I know when to keep my mouth shut. They are people who have been places and done things and they talk about what's going on in the world and not about who socked who at the club the night before. It is more or less of a musical crowd and whether or not I can sing, I sing, and I'm having a lot of fun and feel like I'm really growing up."

With the aid of his mother, Tom has been saving his money. I don't mean that he is one to catch his finger in his pocket when the check comes. It is usually the other way. But he has always saved a certain amount of his salary. He is saving one-half of his salary now, which is a very good record when you consider his family expenses, income tax and other drains on his income. Recently he put himself on an allowance of fifty dollars a week, which sounded quite extravagant to me.

"Oh, no," Tom protested. "You see, if I were married, I would eat at home and that expense would go on the food bill for the house, but as it is, although of course I eat at home most of the time, I have to take girls out to dine and dance. That comes out of my allowance and besides I take care of my car, buy my clothes and pay my beach club dues. Fifty dollars doesn't go far. Some weeks it doesn't go half far enough.

"I know I'll never be a Clark Gable or a Fred MacMurray," he said, "but if I mind my business and work hard I might get somewhere some day." And he went on to tell me about his next picture while my mind jumped back to a review of his last picture that I had read the day before. Of Tom's work in "And Sudden Death" a noted critic had written: "The stealer of film honors is Tom Brown, that engaging young juvenile who displays surprising dramatic stature in the unsympathetic role of a befuddled, weakling brother . . ."

"But now they've put me in 'Rose Bowl,' a football picture," Tom wailed, but quickly added: "Oh, well, I guess I'm lucky at that."

Now don't think Tom is a Pollyanna, and I wouldn't for the world try to create an impression that he is a recluse, a student, a stay-at-home. He is invited everywhere because, being good company, he's apt to be the life of the party without all the obnoxious implications that often accompany that classification. He is a lot of fun and cuts quite a dash with the ladies. He belongs to the liveliest beach club. He's seen here and there at the good shows, and pictures and dancing places. In fact, he goes as far and as often as he can—on fifty dollars a week. And his inevitable companion these days and evenings is cute Toby Wing.

"She's the most fun to go out with," he says enthusiastically. "She's a beautiful dancer, and always looks lovely. It's a lot of fun to be with Toby. She's the best all-around girl."

But apparently it's all in fun, and marriage seems to be far from Tom's mind at the moment, although he admits he's looking around for the right girl.

"And when I find her, being twenty-one will be all right," he said—and meant it.

A Star and Her Designer Talk Clothes

put on for pictorial effect! A pair of clips, a brooch and one or two lovely bracelets, all set with rubies, are the choice. Even if rubies are out of reach for most of us, we can follow Ruth's hint of pointing up a costume with colors in jewelry by using simulated stones.

SPEAKING of her "Dodsworth" clothes, she continued, "The smart two-piece suit which Omar Kiam designed, I liked so much that I am buying it for myself. It has a short flared black wool skirt and a very chic jacket of black and white checked wool. The jacket is held together by the leather belt and a green scarf is worn at the neck. With this I wear a black wool beret."

This is the costume on page 64. Notice how the sleeves are made all in one with the body of the jacket and that they end just above the wrist. This suit is typical of the smart daytime costumes for this fall and winter—the fit of the jacket and the flare of the skirt giving a trim line to the figure. Ruth uses one of her ruby-jeweled pins to hold the scarf.

"Another of the costumes which Omar made for me and which I am purchasing, is a stunning black, fuzzy wool suit with a skirt almost identical with the one just described. The jacket is high-waisted and fitted. The tight sleeves flare at the top, and have most amusing little peaks. At the high neck I wear a pair of my diamond and ruby clips. And my hat is so high!" (No photograph was made of this particular model.)

And there was still another gown, the most elaborate evening gown she wears, which was not photographed either, but about which she said:

Of the evening gowns worn in the picture, I particularly like a slinky white crepe frock of Empire design, heavily beaded with crystals. It has a long train and I wear a striking white ermine cape with it. Omar and I designed this one together and put into it our favorite ideas. I hope the result is successful.

"It seems to me that the importance of excellence in materials can't be too heavily stressed. I'd much rather have an absolutely plain gown of fine material, than the most elaborate creation of an inferior one."

And there, my pets, is a little fashion axiom to put right into practice.

As we finished looking at the "Dodsworth" wardrobe she said:

"It's always somewhat of a trial for me to go through the endless fittings and conferences about clothes before a picture starts. I think how pleasant it would be if I were high in the clouds in my plane, wearing my comfortable slacks. But I've learned how to make a game of the whole thing. In preparing these costumes for the picture, Omar and his assistants would come to my house and we would discuss, and fit and argue over tea and sandwiches. If we got tired, we would turn on the phonograph and play a lovely symphony record—our weariness would be forgotten soon and we would start all over again. I think that's the reason we are all so happy about these clothes—we had such a pleasant time making them."

And you feel that she had even a more pleasant time wearing them. Later, when I talked to Omar Kiam, it was interesting to see how he has brought out his pet theories in design for these costumes.

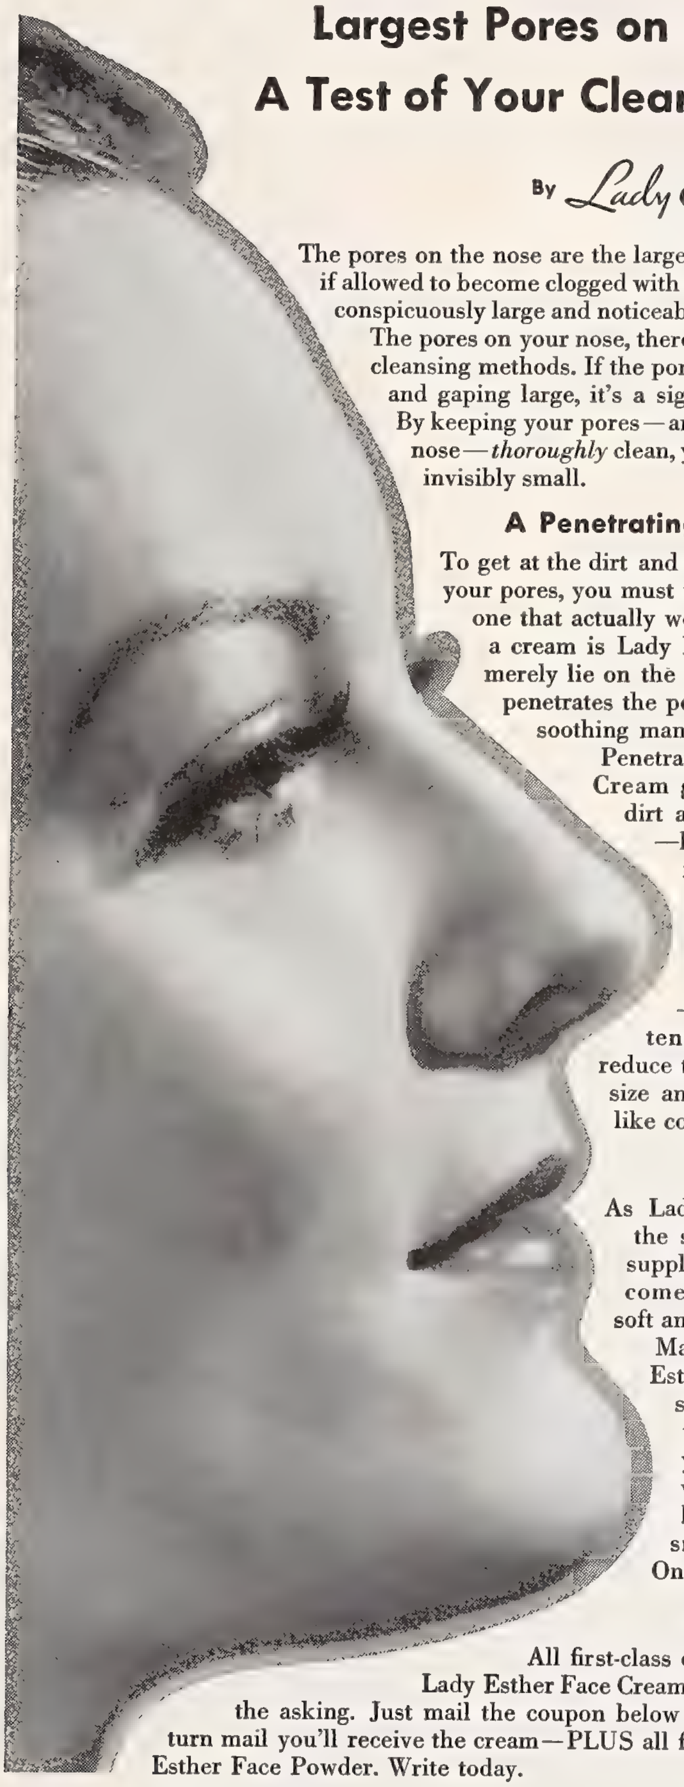
"Short skirts. Higher cut shoes. High hats. In fact, everything is going up!" he said, in describing the new trend.

THE higher cut in shoes is apparent in the unusual suede step-ins which Ruth wears with three of the daytime costumes pictured. Each of the three outfits is quite different in character and yet the shoes are perfect with each. There's the two-piece suit described earlier, then there's the one-piece black wool dress on page 66. It is cut very simply and slightly fitted. The high, round neckline is set off with a triple strand of pearls and the bodice is decorated with a plastron made of white cord in an intricate design.

Her off-the-face black satin hat achieves the height, Omar mentions, with an aigret held by a jeweled pin. Black suede gloves and a black suede bag match the shoes. A distinctive costume from head to foot.

Over this same dress, Ruth wears a nubbed black wool coat that opens, like a redingote, to show the dress beneath. There's a slight flare to the skirt and a trim fitting to the bodice of the coat; otherwise, it is quite simple, with a large collar of silver fox as its only trimming. The huge muff is a lavish detail but not essential to the chic of the whole coat. That tricky black felt hat has a twisted coil of the material to give it a towering look.

Omar's special brand of designing genius is evident in a three-piece ensemble, shown on page 65. Over a collarless, brown tweed jacket and skirt, he poses a beige wool, three-quarter length cape trimmed with broad bands of leopard. These bands run from the widened shoulders to the front hem. Slits in the cape permit the jacket sleeve to show through. In lieu of a blouse, Ruth wears a soft beige scarf caught with a gold clip. Again Omar uses trimming to reach a high point in his hats. This time a fedora-like brown felt has pheasant's tail-feathers as trimming. And how do you like that almost valise-size handbag of brown calf? Isn't it stunning? I could carry a complete wardrobe around in it! You'll find that many of the newest daytime handbags reach such proportions and have the top handle treatment. You definitely are not supposed to tuck these under your arm, they are to be carried by



NOSE PORES

Largest Pores on Your Body—
A Test of Your Cleansing Methods!

By Lady Esther

The pores on the nose are the largest on your body. For this reason, if allowed to become clogged with waxy excretions, they will become conspicuously large and noticeable.

The pores on your nose, therefore, are a good test of your skin-cleansing methods. If the pores are plugged with waste matter and gaping large, it's a sign your methods are insufficient. By keeping your pores—and this includes the pores of your nose—thoroughly clean, you can keep them normal in size invisibly small.

A Penetrating Cream Required

To get at the dirt and waxy matter that accumulates in your pores, you must use a face cream that penetrates, one that actually works its way into the pores. Such a cream is Lady Esther Face Cream. It does not merely lie on the surface of your skin. It actually penetrates the pores, and does it in a gentle and soothing manner.

Penetrating the pores, Lady Esther Face Cream goes to work on the imbedded dirt and waste matter. It dissolves it—breaks it up—and makes it easily removable. In a fraction of the usual time, your skin is thoroughly clean.

Cleansed perfectly, your pores can again function freely—open and close as Nature intended. Automatically then, they reduce themselves to their normal small size and you no longer have anything like conspicuous pores.

Lubrication, Also

As Lady Esther Face Cream cleanses the skin, it also lubricates it. It resupplies it with a fine oil that overcomes dryness and keeps the skin soft and smooth.

Make a test on your face of Lady Esther Face Cream. See for yourself how thoroughly it cleans out the pores. Mark how quickly your pores come down in size when relieved of their choking burden. Note the new life and smoothness your skin takes on. One test will tell you volumes.

See For Yourself!

HAPPY RELIEF FROM PAINFUL BACKACHE

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

"Skirts will be shorter than they have been in many seasons," Omar amplified his first brief statement. "And, of course, they will be fuller. For evening I still prefer the long, graceful line."

And as proof of his feeling about evening clothes, look at the black crepe and lamé dinner gown on page 64. The gown beneath the flared peplum jacket of metallic cloth is cut on form-fitting lines with the fullness drawn to the back to form a short but full train. Vivid red and green is shot through the metal of the jacket giving a startling contrast to the gown. The shoulders are full and slightly puffed at the shoulders. Two clips and one of her bracelets form the only trimming.

As if fearing he might be misinterpreted, Omar said: "When I say that shoes will be cut higher, I do not mean the old high shoes of Edwardian time, but the shoes cut to cover the instep and sometimes the ankle with a higher heel. In 'Dodsworth' I have used this type of shoe almost exclusively, both for street and evening.

"And as for hats, there is no limit to their versatility and height! Most of mine are designed to be worn high off the face.

"There is a marked tendency to smoother fabrics than for sometime past. This, however, might be called a forerunner to the future. We will not discard rough tweeds and knobby materials, especially for sports wear."

Although neither Kiam nor Ruth described or talked about the two negligees worn in the picture, I am showing you pictures of them because they are so utterly charming. One is a hostess gown of palest pink chiffon, made with a sweeping train and high waist. The neckline, bordered with fur, is very low at front and old-fashioned pink roses are tucked into it at the bosom. The sleeves are short and draped. Velvet would make a beautiful and less extravagant collar for our purpose.

Another robe is a dressing gown of heavy red and white brocaded satin made like a redingote but reaching to the floor where it sweeps out in a slight train effect. The top is rather tailored. It buttons at the waist and has interesting large patch pockets. The gown worn beneath this is finely accordion pleated from the lace yoke to the hem.

This is the sort of screen wardrobe that provides a wealth of inspiration for us all because it is so timely, so full of the important fashion news of the moment. And both Ruth's and Kiam's fashion ideas are alive with hints for all of you.

there, flabby flesh anywhere, nor spare tires. You need not be of the spindling chest-broad rear variety. You may be large-boned and weigh 140, and still be trim and slim if the 140 pounds are in the right places. You may be tall, but tiny-boned, and be too fat at 130. The actual weight doesn't matter so much. It's the trimness and firmness of your body which means youth. I'll come back to this anon.

2. That clean, scrubbed look which the young skin has. Everybody isn't born with a complexion that is an all-time wow as far as texture and coloring are concerned. But no one need have bumps and blemishes around longer than it takes to banish them with proper diet and a little judicious external doctoring. Nobody need have that muddy look which comes from myriad grimy deposits in the pores and which aren't vicious enough to be called blackheads—yet—but which soon will be. The clean, scrubbed look doesn't bar make-up by any means. More about this, also, as we get on with our lecture.

3. A silkiness and sheen to your hair, no matter whether it's an enviable blonde or plain mouse-brown. As you get older, the youthful gold of your hair may darken; the various shades of red hair, too, get darker and less interesting, sometimes, with the passage of years—even a few years. You may—or may not—choose to do anything to restore the color. That's your business. Your hair even may go prematurely gray at a very early age. About all this, I care not one whoop, so long as you don't let your hair get lifeless, stringy, too dry or too oily, and generally unmanageable. No amount of professional waving will help you if there isn't good hair to start with. Remember that.

4. Of course, you have to get along through life with the set of features God gave you. But you can do a heck of a lot to improve upon Nature's short dealing, if you have been short-dealt. I know heaps of girls—and so do you—with very unclassical noses, eyes that are nothing to write home about, perhaps not one decent feature to their names, and what difference does that make? How often have you heard folks say, "She's not the least bit good looking, but she's awfully attractive"? Where features are concerned, the older you get, the luckier you are. It's pretty bad taste for the poor-featured sixteen-year-old to go monkeying around with the eyeshadow and the bright lipstick. But it isn't bad taste for the older girl—it's just plain smart.

Now, to get down to the tacks made of brass . . . I shall do this, if it's all the same to you, by picking a series of examples from experiences which I've come across and by making up out of my own little head a few more examples which may be helpful to you. If I don't hit your particular trouble, write your case history down on a piece of paper and mail it to me.

Example one: Girl twenty-two, tall, five feet seven and slenderly built. Basically good figure, with only one fault. A spare tire around the waist. It shows badly in the new waist-hugging dresses when she wears a girdle. When she doesn't wear a girdle, that extra fat is still there, of course, imparting a general thickness to the middle of her body. This girl sits all day. She says, sensibly enough, that she must wear a snug girdle because she doesn't want the rear to spread. That's fine. But the snug girdle does push up that hunk of flesh around the waist. Any way you slice it, it's very bad, especially with all the new clothes fitting one's middle like the paper on the wall.

This is a very common complaint. I'm not talking about the person who is too fat all over, or at least plenty too fat in the hips. This particular girl is slim—has a nice figure—good, firm, slender hips and a properly proportioned buzzoom. She's just getting her first warning of what might happen if she doesn't start the cure right now.

TEN minutes of bending exercises every morning—that's the first order. And you can't beat the old toe-touching stunt. Then, one-half hour's brisk walk early in the morning. Walking won't reduce you, but it will help make you trim and firm. But you must really beetle along at a brisk pace and keep your stomach and diaphragm pulled in flat every minute of the time.

Now this girl should eat no heavy sweets, no heavy starches, and the fat content in her diet should be low. And what does that mean? It means that she may have sugar in her coffee or tea, if those beverages are exceedingly distasteful to her without, but she must have no cake, no pie, no ice cream. Fruit is what she gets for dessert, or gelatine, or sherbet. She may, furthermore, have a couple of slices of crisp toast for breakfast, with a very little butter, but she should not eat spaghetti, or rice, or any cereals, nor need she have bread, rolls, or crackers with luncheon and dinner. She must eat no fried foods whatsoever. A baked or boiled potato is all right, with a little butter rather than gravy. In other words, she should cut down—rather than cut out entirely. This is harder to do, sometimes, but if the gal has good sense, she will really make this effort to effect certain eliminations in her diet.

Example number two concerns a young married person who has recently had a baby. If you really want to know, I'm using myself as an example and telling you exactly what my doctor told me to do after my young hopeful appeared on the scene. Already, I've received a small ton of letters from young mamas, detailing their problems to me, and believe me, the problems aren't to be minimized. That's why I'm offering myself as Exhibit B.

First thing, ask your own doctor, please, if the following suggestions are okay for you. Every individual is different. You may have some particular complication that needs particular coddling. If you're strong and healthy, none of the following stunts should be in the least strenuous—but all the same, consult your doctor.

Now I didn't do a blessed thing for the first two weeks. I lay around and got my stren'th back. At the end of two weeks, I came home, and the very next day, I started in. The first exercise was to get on the bed on my knees and place my shoulders down on the bed as flat as I could get them. That's all. And just stay there five minutes the first day, six minutes the second day, and so on, up until ten minutes.

The second exercise—third day out—was to lie on the floor and place one thick book on my tum and raise it up with my stomach muscle, five times. Next day, six times, and so on, up to ten times. Then add another book, and keep up the good work.

The third exercise—fourth day out—was to lie on the floor and raise first one leg straight up in the air without bending the knee, then the other. Five times each. This is a cinch, but don't skip it, because it prepares you for the next, which isn't such a cinch.

When you're really beginning to feel pretty spry and peppy, try raising both legs up off the floor, without bending your knees, and without raising your shoulders off the floor either. This really gets the old stomach muscles to working.

When you can do this with reasonable efficiency, try raising the top part of your body up off the floor without bending your knees or letting your legs leave the floor. Don't go at it too hard. Once the first day, twice the second day, and so on.

The point of all these exercises is to get your middle flat and firm again—and it doesn't hurt the hips a particle either. Don't be too impatient, but be faithful, and pretty soon—you'll be surprised—you'll be able to get into that evening dress you only wore once before . . . well, before.

Example three concerns the girl whose face begins to look old before it has any business to do so. Sagging chin, lines, dry skin—dry skin is the biggest problem—and a sort of roughness and crepiness of the throat that is by no means youthful. The answer to the lines, dry skin and crepiness lies in cream—heaps of it—oily cream. Cleanse your face with cream at night twice and then, without using a tonic or water or anything, put on a film of maybe the same cream or maybe a heavier kind, if you can afford two, and leave it on, overnight if possible—if not, at least for twenty minutes or so. Don't use hot water, ever—even the steam that rises from a nice hot bath dries out your skin just a little more. Use lukewarm water in the morning and rinse with lukewarm water—not cold. Cold is refreshing and just dandy for normal or oily skins, but for dry skins it's too harsh. If you simply must relax in a hot bath now and then, smear the jolly old face with plenty of cream beforehand. Use a creamy foundation for your makeup. Use a cream rouge. And the lightest, softest powder you can find. Give your neck all the coddling every time you do your face.

A sagging chin takes plenty of work. Slap under it with the back of your hand. Keep your head up always and kind of stick your jaw out, consciously—whenever you think of it.

Write for my Skin Routine Number 2 which includes (a) treatment for dry skins (b) oily skins and (c) just plain bad skins.

Example four concerns the girl with what is commonly known as middle-age spread. Only, the sad part is, too often the spread happens before middle age. Do the rolling stunt I gave you in my first article: sit on the floor, grab your ankles with your hands and roll yourself round and round until it hurts. Wear a good girdle. Pull in your rear consciously—you can, you know—while you're walking, standing, sitting. Tighten it up and keep it from getting flabby.

Example five concerns the gal whose pretty hair goes completely wonky for some reason or other. An illness, maybe. Children, perhaps. Neglect—usually. So long as there's a wave in it, most women never give a thought to their hair. For a long time, nature will bear up under a constant onslaught of careless shampooing and hasty waving. Then nature says, "Phooey!" and thereafter no wave will stay in longer than two minutes and a general drabness sets in that no amount of artificial doctoring can remedy.

NOW, I often think of the movie stars in this connection. Goodness knows, many of them have their hair dyed and tinkered with until the color bears no resemblance to the original shade. But the texture of their hair—the shine and health of it—persists through all this. Most of you need not and should not submit your locks to the treatment that the movie star just has to, more or less. Why should your hair look like last year's bird's nest? The answer is, it shouldn't. Again, oil, plus brushing, plus massage is the answer to good, shining, healthy hair—and I don't care what else you do to it. These treatments are within the means of everyone. You can use olive oil, castor oil, or prepared oil treatments, which smell a heck of a sight nicer and cost but very little. Warm the oil and rub it into your scalp. Furthermore, take a piece of cotton and rub it along the length of your hair. Then wrap a hot towel around your head; or stand over a steaming kettle; or go out in the sunshine, if you live in the sunny south. And answer letters or do your knitting, while the oil gets in its good work.

Then shampoo—and never use a cake of soap on your hair. Prepared liquid shampoo or a melted down half-cake of any good soap—these are what you should use. Two soapings and half a dozen rinsings, under a shower or spray, and then maybe a light rinse in the last water to give your hair pretty lights and color. If you can dry the wool out in the air, fine. Anyway, keep massaging your scalp all the time your hair is drying. Give your hair sharp pulls and tugs—it stimulates the scalp. And when it's dry, brush it—vigorously, if it's coarse—very gently, with a medium stiff brush, if it's fine. Keep this up for six months and, if you don't find a marked improvement at the end of that time, you have my full permission to write to me and tell me I'm a so-and-so.

You have my full permission to write to me, anyway, whether you think I'm a so-and-so or not. Write to me if you're fat; write to me if you're thin; write to me if your skin is bad. I'm no miracle woman, but I can tell you a thing or two that will help. The address is Mary Marshall, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. Please don't forget to enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Up to now, I've been answering all of you who forgot about that envelope but hereafter, I'm not a-goin' ter do it, so there. Furthermore—may I tell our Canadian customers that Canadian stamps ain't no use in these here United States. Enclose three cents, like good girls, if you live in Canada. She Has a Way with Her would the other feel? They faced each other seriously. "I hope you get it," said Lily. "No, you should have it," protested Katharine. "You're so much prettier than I am."

"But you've had experience!" Recalling that phrase now, many years later, Claudette laughs at her Lily-naïvete.

"Two years before," said Claudette, "Katharine had starred in a school play, so of course, she would get the part. It was so certain that I decided not even to try for it. But it took me a long time to sell her on the idea—all the way down in the trolley, as a matter of fact. How serious we were sitting there side by side, and yet how funny we must have looked to the other passengers. The Irish-brogue Katharine and French-girl me jabbering so earnestly to each other. I went over and over the fact that I didn't want to be an actress anyway. Finally she gave in. I remember she put out her hand and said, 'Well, all right, if you promise not to be envious and never to regret it, and if it won't make any difference in our friendship.' We shook hands solemnly."

TRUE to her intention, Lily refused to announce herself and sat in a far corner of the dark, dingy Provincetown Theatre, while Katharine went up onto the stage to try out for Mr. Deeter. When the reading was over he shook his head and looked doubtful, which was all that was needed to spur the loyal Lily immediately into action. She dashed forward, took Mr. Deeter's arm and in a burst of French enthusiasm began to extol her friend's merits. She extolled so fast and with such pep and vivacity that Mr. Deeter just stood and looked at her. When she saw the arresting look in his eyes, she suddenly stopped. "Don't stop," he said. "Go on. That's delightful. You're just the girl I want!"

For a brief moment Lily failed to understand. Then Mr. Deeter handed her the script. "Here's your part. Learn the first ten lines and report here for rehearsal in the morning at nine. Thank you both for coming down. Goodby." And he left.

The girls in the darkness and the emptiness of that historical barn stood ten feet apart and across the canvas-covered seats searched for each other's eyes. But their vision was wet and blurred. Then they moved closer and their hands met and gripped tightly. Simultaneously, they uttered their thoughts. "Gosh, I'm sorry," said Lily. And at the same instant, "Gosh, I'm glad," said Katharine.

And so in that moment Lily was set on a new path, a path she was to tread in fame, as Claudette Colbert, and in the same moment her friend stepped off it. Never again were they to walk in rivalry. As Katharine often said in the years that followed, "It's more fun being proud of you, anyway." And when she married, she showed her love and pride by naming her first baby Claudette.

One more anecdote about the young charmer, Lily, before we come back to the grown-up one, Claudette. This, too, involves Katharine. As is the case in most French families, Lily was never given any money, but Katharine had an allowance.

"I always sponged on her, too," admits Claudette today. "With the interest added, I suppose I really owe her a small fortune now. For months we had contemplated being really devilish and buying some rouge. Neither of us had ever worn any make-up and we had reached the ripe age of sixteen. So, our nerve geared up, we advanced one day to a department store's make-up counter and, having heard that it was the best, requested vegetable rouge. You might have thought we were buying a car, we were so cautious and questioning, and extravagance-guilty. Afterward, outside on the street, we broke the cake in two and each took a half. That was what nearly proved to be my undoing, because naturally, from that moment on the rouge was in a constant state of crumble. That afternoon I put some on, but rubbed most of it off, if the state of my fingers was any indication. Of course, I didn't notice the fingers. I was too intent on doing a subtle job on my face. But my mother noticed them. Still she had such faith in the innocence of her 'child' that it never occurred to her that it was rouge.

"She took one look at the red dress I was wearing and said, "I knew that dress was too cheap to be good. Look how the color has come off on your hands. Take it off this minute and put it back in the box—and don't wash your hands. We'll go right to that store and show them!"

"So nothing would do but as she said. I tried to rub the rouge off on my slip as I was changing, but soap and water was the only thing that would have worked, and mother was hanging around, so I couldn't tackle that. Believe me, I was scared!"

THE scene in the department store that afternoon is easy to reconstruct. The mother proffering her daughter's red-smudged hands to the saleswoman and, at the same time, pointing to the red fabric in the box. The saleswoman—the type who obviously knew all there was to know about rouge—looking closely at the girl's fingers and discovering her secret at once. Then, on the verge of "spilling the beans," she suddenly catches the mute appeal in the brown Lily eyes. For a moment she hesitates. It takes her back, a long way back. Then she smiles and says lightly, "Of course, madame, we will be very glad to make an adjustment." And another way out is won!

Claudette has been hypnotizing them right and left ever since. What it is, nobody knows, but anyway, it "gets" you. Recently, it even knocked the pins right out from under a determined-to-hate newspaper critic in New York. For years this particular critic had panned Claudette at every opportunity. Not gentle digs either. What he said, he said venomously. Yet, as he admitted in print on numerous occasions, he had nothing personal against the girl. He had never even met her.

For several years Claudette suffered his attacks in silence. Then she decided that she wanted to meet him face to face and personally ask him the reason for his enmity. She gave a party in New York and invited him. Even in front of her other guests she took the cat by its whiskers and asked him.

"Because you're the kind of actress who should never play anything but French maids on the screen," he answered promptly.

There were two things that any other star would have done under the circumstances: one, laugh it off; the other, throw him out. Claudette did neither.

She said, "Gosh, you may be right. I've never done one on the screen, but if I could find a good one, I'd try." That shut him up for the time being, but anyone could see that he was disdainful.

Several weeks later Claudette wired him from the coast, "Well, I'm doing it—the part of a French girl for the first time on the screen. Not a ladies' maid, but I wait on table and sell cigarettes."

The part was that of Cigarette, of course, in "Under Two Flags," the kind of part she had always steered clear of, afraid of being typed as the French girl she is.

"Pick up the aggies—you win!" the return telegram read. "I'm a fan, and an ardent one from now on!"

You see, it isn't that she sets out to entice. Contrarily, the fact that she doesn't, is the secret. Like that morning coming in late to the publicity department. Had she arrived dripping sables or cooing fabulous excuses and apologies, she would never have gotten away with it. Appearing hatless, in slacks, and being herself, she can get away with anything.

mascaraed; plucked arches for eyebrows; and even white teeth.

"Oh, I don't know," she answered vaguely. "But, you see, in the theatre no one pays the slightest attention to you, no matter who you are. If you need a hairdresser or want one, it's your job to get her. The same with a dentist and all those things. But, in pictures, there's always the hairdresser and the make-up man, and they're always looking after you. I like it," she admitted, dimpling.

"Did you find Hollywood easy from the start?" we asked.

"Well, yes and no."

Doris Nolan is a New York born girl, who was brought up in New Rochelle, where her family still lives. She was born on July 14, 1916. She has an older sister, Gladys, and a younger brother, Warren. While in the New Rochelle High School, Doris gratified her yearning to act. She appeared in several school sketches and plays and received good newspaper notices for her work.

"After that," she declared, "there was no holding me. I was bound to be an actress."

NEITHER her father, who is a New York woolen importer, nor her mother—whom she calls by her first name of Mary and who is now with her in Hollywood—objected to her career ideas. So Doris, without any difficulty, applied for and received her chance to act professionally with the Clinton Hollow Stock Company at Poughkeepsie, New York. A motion picture scout from the Fox Studios saw her and asked her to make a screen test. She did, and the result was that Fox signed her up and sent her West.

"But that wasn't so easy as it promised to be," Doris said. "Mary and I didn't know a soul in Hollywood and for three solid months we still didn't know anybody. We lived in an apartment in Beverly Hills and just had ourselves to talk to, except when I went to the studio."

But the studio didn't assign her to any picture during all this time.

"Didn't you do anything the entire time you were there?" we questioned.

"Well, yes," and Doris grinned. "You see, I speak a little French. As it happened, the studio signed an actress who was French—I won't tell you her name—and, knowing I could speak French, they asked me to see that she found an apartment and got settled."

"It's funny that a studio that size wouldn't have an interpreter around for that kind of thing," we remarked.

"Well, I don't know." Doris was diplomatic. "Anyway, I was glad to do what I could for her. But it was a little hard being out in Hollywood six months and not working. I would have gone a little mad if I hadn't been able to ride horseback."

"You like that sort of thing?"

"Um. One of these days I hope to have some horses of my own. The rides are grand, too, on the coast. You can go up in the hills and the mountains, you know. And the mountain climbing is great, too. There are grand spots all around for that, as well as horseback riding."

When her picture contract expired—that was last year, in 1935—and was not renewed, Doris got the opportunity to play the feminine lead in "Daughter of Cain," a stage play produced at a community theatre in Hollywood.

"Luck was with me," she said.

Al Woods, well-known New York stage producer, saw her in this play and engaged her on the spot to come to New York and play the lead in his stage production of "The Night of January 16." That was last winter.

"Luck stayed with me," Doris laughed.

One night, Dan Kelley, Universal studio casting director, who had come East to scout for new screen talent, went to see this play. He saw Doris, liked her, signed her to the dotted line and a long-term Universal contract.

"When the play finished its run last spring," Doris said, "Mary and I went back to Hollywood and this time I went to work almost right away in 'The Man I Marry.'"

"And you're featured in your first talkie," we commented.

"Yes."

"You're right about your career," we agreed. "It almost does sound too easy."

She has been in New York recently, where she played the featured lead in another Al Woods play, "Arrest That Woman." However, the show's run was extremely short and Doris went West again to do another picture. She still has one more play to do for Mr. Woods.

She doesn't go out much socially in Hollywood because she doesn't enjoy the social life. She frankly prefers trailing around in slacks to getting dressed up and going places. Nor does she care for night life. She likes to read, and she likes to have friends for dinner and sit around afterwards or go for a ride in the car or a horseback canter or a tramp in the hills. She wears no jewelry—neither rings, bracelets, nor necklaces. However, she does admit to one terrific yen. She loves to write.

At the rate she is going, Doris Nolan should soon have quite a bit of experience, though perhaps this includes falling in love and at this date Doris hasn't gotten around to that pertinent phase of heart throbs. Hers, thus far, have come through her career.

"And maybe that was too easy," she says.

Maybe Doris Nolan is one of those fortunate youngsters who doesn't have to garner her experience at the expense of heartbreak and tears. Her sense of humor and ready smile should save her a lot of that sort of thing. One rather hopes so, anyway, for she's a likeable youngster and not at all uppity-uppity at being a featured player headed for stardom on both the screen and the stage at the ripe young age of twenty.

Does a Diploma Count in Hollywood?

Franchot is still a featured player, a highly successful one to be sure, but still not a star. While Clark Gable, who called his education complete when he was graduated from a small-town high school and who spent the next years roaming around the world, working at any and all kinds of jobs, is one of the most important of the screen's first-rankers.

"Sometimes I think that too much education is bad for an actor or actress. It so often seems to ruin their natural emotions by smoothing them, inhibiting them," I once heard Norma Shearer say to Jim Tully, the writer. Norma spent only a few scattered years in schoolrooms. Jim ran away from an orphans' home before he had finished grade school and spent the next few years as a youthful hobo. Both Norma and Jim are among Hollywood's favorite children, headliners in their two fields.

Wallace Beery heard the call of life and the open road when he was in the fourth grade. He ran away from school and never went back. Today Wally is glad that he spent those next years, riding the rods and working in circuses, instead of poring over books. He was meeting the men and learning to understand the life which he is bringing to the screen today. During those same years the Morgan brothers, Frank and Ralph, were attending Cornell and Columbia Universities. Today they are featured players but neither has attained the fame and popularity of the unschooled Wally.

FATE dumped Bob Montgomery out of school and into work and, finally, into Hollywood. When his father died very suddenly, Bob was forced to leave the prep school, where he was preparing for college, and to go to work. If that tragedy had not befallen the Montgomery family, Bob would probably have finished his university education and gone into some kind of business.

"I probably learned more in those few years of bumping up against the world than I could have learned in a dozen colleges," Bob said. At least, he learned to fight his way to success and stardom.

Look at the names which twinkle in electric lights above the theatres. Fred Astaire, Ginger Rogers, W. C. Fields, Greta Garbo, Claudette Colbert, Jean Harlow, Mae West, Myrna Loy, Janet Gaynor, Grace Moore, William Powell. A dozen others. Not one of them is listed on the alumni records of any university.

Instead of going to college, Fred Astaire danced with his sister, Adele, on various vaudeville and musical comedy stages. Ginger Rogers crooned and Charlestoned in vaudeville. W. C. Fields juggled colored balls and learned to make audiences howl with laughter. Greta Garbo worked in a Stockholm department store and played bits in slapstick comedies in her native Sweden. Claudette Colbert played small parts on the stage and in the Eastern motion picture studios. Jean Harlow ran away from a girls' school to be married and, later, played extras in Hollywood. Mae West sang her riotous, lusty songs in vaudeville theatres. Myrna Loy taught dancing, posed for sculptors and played bits in Hollywood pictures. Janet Gaynor struggled to find a foothold in the silent pictures. Grace Moore ran away from a finishing school and sang in musical comedy road companies. Bill Powell trouped in road shows and stock companies.

Of course, there are the few exceptions which prove the rule. Katharine Hepburn is a graduate of Bryn Mawr. Fredric March was graduated from the University of Wisconsin. John Beal has a diploma from the University of Pennsylvania. They are, however, a mere drop of higher education in Hollywood's overflowing bucket of practical experience.

THE younger set of players, the boys and girls now stepping into fame, are facing the same problems and conditions that were met by their older brothers and sisters. Only one of the headliners of the new crop is a university graduate, Robert Taylor.

The writers and directors show the same indifference to college diplomas. Frances Marion, who has been topnotch among the scenario writers for many years, both in silent and in talking pictures, learned the secret of her human touch and understanding in the editorial rooms of a San Francisco newspaper, in a Los Angeles advertising agency and in the cutting rooms of the studios, not in any university. W. S. Van Dyke, one of the ace directors, who made "Trader Horn," "Eskimo," "The Thin Man," "Naughty Marietta" and "San Francisco" with a brilliant and versatile ease, was working in lumber camps, mining coal, driving trucks and acting in small theatrical companies, while many other boys of his age were studying and playing their way through college.

As a rule, I think that you'll find that the really successful people in Hollywood are the ones who have bumped up against the sharp edges of life, who have had to fight for everything they've earned," Van Dyke told me. "A college education is a wonderful thing, if you can afford to spend those valuable years learning the experiences of others. Understand, I'm not talking about the training for a definite profession where a college education is an absolute necessity. I'm speaking of the general cultural courses which may pave the way for several kinds of work.

"I believe in the cultural benefits of a university education. Again I say, if you can afford it, don't miss it. But I can't ever feel sorry when I hear people bemoaning the fact that some boy or girl is not going to be able to have a college course because of financial circumstances."

A recent census of the studios showed a high percentage of college graduates among the technicians, the cameramen, electricians, sound engineers and designers. In those fields Hollywood puts a high valuation on college diplomas. But, even there, you'll find that the most successful men and women have had several years of practical experience, in addition to their university training.

One producer, who has built many stars, summed up Hollywood's attitude toward higher education among its players when he said, "A young person with only a fundamental education and with his natural emotions unspoiled by the restrictions and inhibitions which so often come with too much training, has a better chance of succeeding than a schooled and polished youngster who has been taught to reason with a clear, cold logic. For its actors, writers and directors Hollywood needs experience and emotional understanding instead of 'book learning.'"

Hollywood is a young person's town and a practical town. If you have an honest ability and a background of practical experience you have a good chance to find success, whether you have a college education or not.

It didn't look as if he would be anything but an awfully naughty boy from a nice family, who thought the world was his oyster.

AT the very beginning of things, Humphrey was born on Christmas Day in 1900, which makes it comparatively simple to keep track of his age. He was a right handsome little boy, from the pictures his mother had around. I can only vouch for him from eighteen on, and he looked all right then, after they got the bandages off.

I wasn't the only girl he had permanently in wrong with her family on account of those three o'clock in the mornings, and the fights, but all of us thought he was worth it. We were convinced that any man who could dance that well and put up a good fight, on any provocation whatever—or none—had a great future.

We virtually thrived on the masquerade brawls in Webster Hall and the Kit Kat Club and even Tammany Hall. We "did" the Village regularly, which was known in a casual off-hand manner as "slumming." Actually the Village was more fun than any place, in those halcyon days. That is, it was when Humphrey managed to keep out of a fight. I guess it was fun even when he didn't, at least he seemed to enjoy it. I had to go home alone many a time.

WHEN we get together these days the dialogue goes like this:

Humphrey says, "Do you remember the time your Stutz ran out of gas on the Queensborough Bridge at three A. M. and I had to push it over the rise?"

"Remember the time we ran into the elevated post on Sixth Avenue?" says I. "And what the cop said? And the time we went to court with that speeding ticket, and the cop lied like a gentleman—said we were only doing forty—so we took him to lunch at Rector's? He ordered everything in the place, and we only had two dollars between us, so he had to pay the check?"

"Did you ever look him up and pay it back?"

Humphrey looks pained. "Madame, you will never find a Bogart lacking in the finer principles. Besides, what if he had caught me speeding after that?"

"Ha, my point. He couldn't, because your father wouldn't let you have the car. You always smashed it."

"The last time it was your fault. Remember that masquerade at Webster Hall—you wore two beads and a buckle and I was a Spanish toreador—very hot stuff?"

"Uh huh."

Humphrey is a superb ignorer. He went right on, "And the fenders were off the Stutz having the wrinkles ironed out and the headlights wouldn't work, so we drove past the new subway excavation and picked up red lanterns and tied 'em all over the car?"

"Wonder what kept us out of jail?"

". . . and it began to rain pitchforks," Humphrey barged on, "so we arrived at the party soaked and covered with mud—were we sights! Then we retired to the ladies' and gents' rooms to take a bath, with thousands of people milling around. And, if memory serves me right, you were the belle of the ball because most of your beads dissolved."

"You didn't do so badly yourself with that artist's model made up for Lady Godiva."

". . . and then, at three A. M., you happened to think of the aviator, arriving from Kelly Field at seven, an awful heel but anyway you had promised to meet him, so we thought it would be just dandy to go in costume. The party was about over, so after the fight—it was a lovely fight, too, remember?—we drove uptown to my house, and mother got up and made coffee for us. Remember?"

But, to proceed from where Humphrey left off, it was finally six o'clock or so, and the Bogart butler was sprinkling the lawn out front—even a lawn four feet square is quite a rare thing in New York, and he felt tender about it. Then he observed the splashed car at the curb and felt tender about that, too, so when we emerged to meet the aviator it had water on the spark plugs and wouldn't start. Humphrey's mother (a very grand woman with an understanding soul) gave Humphrey some keys. He sprinted away and returned with his father's car. By that time, we had fifteen minutes to make it.

The gay Spanish toreador, with mud on his bolero, started down Broadway at a pretty good clip. They launder the streets at that time of morning to make them nice and slippery, so when a taxi materialized against our fender, we turned around three times and wound up in a delicatessen window.

The taxi was still healthy, so we got in and arrived twenty minutes late. After roaming around and asking a lot of startled people if they had seen an aviator, we found him in the Pennsylvania Hotel, with his uniform sent out to be pressed and he hadn't brought a spare. After a telephone conference, it was agreed unanimously that an aviator, without his pants, added to our festive group would be one too many. Humphrey decided to let the whole thing drop and have some breakfast, in spite of the fact that I happened to be engaged to the aviator at the time.

Well, that was one episode. The others will have to ride, unless you want a serial.

Of course Humphrey was getting educated in the meantime. Just sort of incidentally, he went to school.

Later, there was an interval during which he was part of the United States Navy, a very small part to be sure. But to hear him tell it, he practically was running the show, and all the girls were pretty impressed. I never saw a sailor who did any more for the uniform, I have to hand him that. Whenever he happened to be out of the brig, he cut quite a swath.

Next thing we knew, he was an actor. That isn't what the critics said at first. But they changed their minds later.

The William Bradys being relatives—Humphrey and young Bill (who recently met a tragic death) were inseparable from the time they were kids—Grace George (Mrs. Brady) gave Humphrey a small walk-on part in one of her plays. On the opening night Humphrey discovered he couldn't talk very well, his mouth seemed to be full of cotton—sometimes known as stage-fright—so he walked off to get a drink of water, leaving the leading man standing there with nothing to say. Of course, Humphrey came back eventually. One critic remarked, "The young man identified on the program as Humphrey Bogart was not only mediocre, he was terrible."

Three plays later, Mr. Woolcott ate his words via the public prints, reversing his decision with gratifying thoroughness.

Around this time, Helen Menken and Humphrey announced their engagement. The marriage lasted only a year because they were separated almost continuously, due to professional engagements, and simply drifted in opposite directions. They were divorced in 1925. Humphrey met Mary Phillips in "Meet the Wife"—she played his wife. They have been married ten years now and they have worked out the separations perfectly by not asking each other any questions. Mary arrived recently in Hollywood, after concluding a long engagement in "The Postman Always Rings Twice."

In his teens, when the century was trying to keep up with him, Humphrey was a pretty arrogant, fresh kid. He had the beginning of a career tossed in his lap and took it all in stride. He was, he says, a "one-dimension person." His first six plays were smash hits, and he made personal triumphs in almost every one, after that first one. He thought the theatre was always like that, one hit after another. Then the rude awakening. He hit a lull that informed him what it was all about, in a few short telling strokes. Plays began to fail—a series of flops, each year worse than the last. One year, he worked six weeks.

In 1932, he came out to the coast under contract to Fox. No outstanding roles resulted. Soon after he arrived that time, I happened to be calling on a friend in the Hollywood Hospital. He said Humphrey was in the next room.

There he was—bandages and all. It seemed like old times. He said I ought to see the other fellow, before I had a chance to say it first.

He returned to New York after this contract expired, and his next real success was in the stage play, "Petrified Forest." Leslie Howard insisted that he play the same part in the picture, so Humphrey came back to Hollywood—sitting pretty, this trip.

He's kind of a nice guy—wears well—and is just as amusing since he got good sense, although it certainly was a surprise.

He hasn't had a fight—not a real one, avec bandages—this trip. But you never can tell.

What's Ahead for Norma Shearer?

OF course, Mr. Thalberg has guided her career, has led her into stardom. It was he who made all the important decisions of her professional life, who kept her star shining brightly through the years in which they worked together. Norma has always been the first to give him the credit for her success. She has had utter faith in his judgment, has always followed his directions with an implicit trust.

"Irving is always right," Norma told me one day. Higher praise than that, no woman can give a man, no wife can give a husband.

However, all Hollywood knows and respects Norma's intelligence. She was born for success. If she had been a school teacher or a stenographer or a saleswoman, she would have been the best in her field. She knows no half measures. She is a tireless worker. No detail is too small for her consideration. She knows the secret of absolute concentration, of directed determination. There is no doubt that Mr. Thalberg developed and furthered her career as an actress. But Norma possesses the ability which made that development possible. She depended upon Mr. Thalberg, while he lived, knowing better than anyone the depths of his understanding, the quality of his genius. But, now that he is gone, Norma is capable of standing alone, of walking onward without help.

On her wedding day, Norma became two people, and several times, during the last few years, she has been torn between these two selves, the actress and the woman. Always the woman has defeated the actress. After the birth of little Irving, in spite of the fact that she had just achieved the greatest success of her career in "The Divorcee," Norma was willing to give up her professional life in order to devote herself entirely to wifehood and motherhood, if her husband so desired.

"But Irving wants me to go on with my work," she told me at that time, "so I shall continue in pictures. However, we have agreed that I shall stop my work whenever Irving thinks best."

Again, at another high spot in her career, she deserted the screen for a year and went to Europe with her two Irvings. Mr. Thalberg's physicians had said that he must have a complete rest, a change of surroundings, if he wished to regain his always fragile health. The years of long, intense working hours, of wearing, nerve-racking labor, had taken their toll of his strength. Norma, the actress, knew that it was almost fatal to a career to retire for an entire year. Norma, the woman, didn't care about careers or futures for herself. She thought only of the health and welfare of the man she loved.

In the studio they put aside their personal relationship and became fellow workmen, striving for the same results—artistic and successful pictures. They worked in complete accord, the actress and the executive producer. They followed a unique system in preparing a Shearer picture. The script was broken down into sequences, similar to the acts of a stage play. Each sequence was rehearsed in its entirety before its separate scenes were filmed. When the director and Norma were satisfied with the results of the many rehearsals, Mr. Thalberg arrived on the stage. Usually he sat on a photographer's stool behind the cameras. Quietly he watched the action of the scenes, making no comment until the end of the sequence. Then his criticisms and suggestions were made in a low, calm voice to the director. When Mr. Thalberg finally approved the rehearsal, the actual filming was begun, the long sequence being broken into the shorter scenes, which were necessary for the various camera set-ups and angles.

"Very often I don't know what picture I'm going to do next until I receive an official notification from the studio or read the announcement in the newspapers," Norma said one day. "I never discuss studio affairs, especially my own problems, with Irving at home. We have enough time to talk things over at the studio. I try to make our home a place of rest and relaxation. Besides, I know that whatever Irving decides for me will be best. So I never question his plans."

ALTHOUGH she never interfered with his judgment, Norma influenced Mr. Thalberg's decisions in her own quiet way. Until the arrival of talking pictures Norma had always played sweet and demure heroines. When the studio purchased the stage play, "The Trial of Mary Dugan," for one of its first sound pictures, Norma wanted to play the heroine, to prove to the public that she was a dramatic actress. But Mr. Thalberg was planning to give that picture to one of the studio's already established dramatic stars. Norma was not an experienced emotional actress.

Norma accepted his decision without argument. But she knew what she wanted and she wasn't defeated. She didn't resort to the tearful pleadings which are the weapons of the average wife. That is not Norma's way of gaining her goal. She has always accomplished her purposes by clean-cut, determined actions. That's what she did in the case of "Mary Dugan." She called in the aid of the play's author, Bayard Veiller, and a group of technicians. Quietly they slipped into an empty sound stage and made a test of the court room scene of the play, with Norma enacting the role of the emotional heroine. Then, with shining and excited eyes, she invited Mr. Thalberg into a projection room to see the test. She proved to him that she was capable of bringing to the screen the harassed Mary Dugan, and the picture turned out to be one of her greatest successes.

Almost the same thing happened when the studio bought the Ursula Parrott, best-selling novel, "Ex-Wife," and re-titled it "The Divorcee." The screen was going through the ultra-modern era of feminine freedom, of unconventionality. Casually, Norma asked Mr. Thalberg to consider her for the role of the very modern and unconventional heroine of "The Divorcee." But Mr. Thalberg only smiled. Norma's career had not been built on sex appeal. There were other actresses in the studio who were better fitted for the role.

Norma said no more. Instead, she rented a luxurious and revealing negligee from a Los Angeles costumer, thus avoiding the studio wardrobe and curious questions. She spent an entire afternoon in the gallery of a clever portrait photographer, who was not connected with the studio. The result was a series of pictures of a new Norma, a young woman who was fairly reeking with sex appeal. Timidly she laid these pictures on Mr. Thalberg's desk. He looked at them in amazement, while Norma stood beside him, smiling the eager smile of a child who is silently begging for a new toy.

"I had to prove to Irving that I could look sexy, if it were necessary, for the role of the girl in 'The Divorcee,'" she explained later to her friends.

SHE succeeded. "The Divorcee" opened an entirely new field of stardom in Norma's career. For several pictures Norma ran riot as a modern young woman who managed to eat her emotional cake and have it, too. Then Mr. Thalberg, with the far-seeing wisdom which made him the greatest of all motion picture producers, saw the end of the era of flamboyant sex in screen entertainment, and gave Norma the idealistically lovely "Smilin' Through."

With Mr. Thalberg she shared a splendid generosity in regard to the importance of the other actors in her pictures. She and Mr. Thalberg have always followed the creed that the picture is the important thing, not the star. Consequently, Norma has always been surrounded by the most competent actors available. And never has a good scene been eliminated or changed because some one stole it from the star, as happens so often in Hollywood. Several years ago, after the preview of "Strangers May Kiss," people predicted in whispers that the scenes which Robert Montgomery, a comparative newcomer then, shared with Norma would be re-made. Bob had blithely stolen them with his suave, tongue-in-cheek gaiety.

However, not one scene was changed, and that picture launched Bob into a stardom of his own. The morning after the preview Norma and Bob met on a studio street. Cordially, enthusiastically she congratulated him.

"You were grand in the picture, Bob," she said, "but I've learned my lesson. The next time we work together I'm going to say all the last lines. Then you can't have the final word and steal all my laughs."

With her usual intelligent caution, Norma completely separated her two lives. In the studio she maintained an impersonal, business-like attitude toward Mr. Thalberg. She never entered his office without making an appointment. When she telephoned him, she always explained her message first to his personal secretary, as did all the other people who wished to talk to him. She never took the smallest advantage of her position as the wife of the vice-president in charge of all production of her studio.

Away from the studio, she was solely and entirely the wife, the mother and the home-maker. She guarded Mr. Thalberg's health as zealously as do other devoted wives who have no interest other than their family's welfare. She made no plans or appointments, social or professional, without first consulting Mr. Thalberg.

"Irving's hours are so uncertain," she explained. "He never knows how late he will be detained at the studio. So I manage to have a very elastic schedule at the house. I don't want to worry or hamper Irving by making him feel that it is necessary to have a definite dinner hour or to follow any set routine."

Every evening, between six-thirty and seven, Norma telephoned Mr. Thalberg to ask him about his wishes and plans. Then she arranged the evening accordingly, inviting a few intimate friends for bridge or a picture, if he so wished, or assuring him complete quiet and aloneness if he were tired. Norma managed her home to suit the wishes and happiness of her husband, just as she worked at the studio with the one goal of pleasing him.

"Irving's approval is the most important thing in my professional life," she once said. "The highest praise which I can receive is his 'Good work, Norma.'"

Carrie, and she gives up her profession for a small tailor shop. Prosperity arrives, and the kids grow up and become Arline Judge and John Howard. Young Mr. Howard gets himself into difficulties when trying to be noble, and the whole thing ends with Carrie going to prison to keep her little brood together. Gladys George does an expert portrayal in the leading role, in spite of the arduous task of being so good for so long. John Howard and Arline Judge play capably, although Arline seems a bit mature for her role of a high-school girl. The rest of the cast, including Harry Carey, Isabel Jewell, Jackie Moran, Charlene Wyatt and Hattie McDaniel, is well chosen.

★★ Polo Joe
(Warners)

Here is slick Joe E. Brown entertainment for the kiddies, and those grown-up kiddies (bless their hearts!) whose risibilities are easily tickled by slap-stick antics. His final epic for Warner Brothers (RKO-Radio now has his services) puts Joe on a horse; therefore the title "Polo Joe." It doesn't turn out to be a "horse on Joe," of course, because our acrobatic hero triumphs in the final reel, wins the girl (Carol Hughes), has a chance to exploit, variously, his unique talents. They include: 1. Singing a love song, in Chinese, to the accompaniment of an Oriental orchestral trio. 2. Swinging from a chandelier. 3. A gymnastic encounter with two kidnapers. 4. Rendition of the Three Bears nursery story in his famous "little mouse" style. Summed up, Joe gives his customers their money's worth.

★★ Wedding Present
(Paramount)

A guaranteed gloom-chaser, you can't go wrong on this picture. There's nothing but nonsense to it, but it's done on such a high plane of idiocy that plot weaknesses can be laughed off. The gay and giddy cast rounded up includes Joan Bennett, Cary Grant, George Bancroft, Gene Lockhart and Inez Courtney among others. Joan and Cary are a couple of reporters who have fallen in love on company time. Having taken nothing serious in his life before, Cary could hardly be expected not to treat love as something of a gag. But Joan decides to find someone a bit less insane for a life partner, and picks out Conrad Nagel who has taken life seriously enough to write books about it. Cary wins her back by calling out all the sirens in town, something the girl-friend could never resist. George Bancroft, another editor on the verge of a nervous breakdown, gives a top performance. William Demarest, a gangster with a heart of gold, and Edward Brophy, his assistant racketeer, provide some of the picture's more hilarious moments. We've seen Gene Lockhart to better advantage and Inez Courtney has been a lot funnier. It's Cary Grant's picture, but Joan Bennett will surprise you by not only looking prettier than ever, but delivering a performance with a punch.

Even the more rabid Temple fans will find this picture hard to take. In all justice, we should say that Shirley is in there fighting, down to the last curl. But story and direction are of such shoddy stuff that with every dimple turned on, Miss Temple fails to click in many scenes. Frank Morgan, the old scene-swiper, pulls a couple of fast ones on the star in this picture, too. He plays the role of Shirley's grandfather, an old rascal with more charm than honesty. True, Mr. Morgan is up to his familiar tricks, but a couple of his scenes brought the biggest hand of the picture from the preview audience. Helen Westley as the kindly lady who wants to adopt Shirley and get her out of the gutter gives an excellent performance; Robert Kent is pleasant enough for the romantic interest, while both Delma Byron and Astrid Allwyn, the feminine leads in his life, are decidedly negative. Stepin Fetchit contributes some of his perennially good antics and Jesse Scott and Thurman Black, the "Two Black Dots" are worth getting acquainted with. The plot is a conglomeration of events all leading up to the inevitable song and dance staged by Shirley. The opening number, "Hey, What Did the Bluejay Say?" sung and danced to harmonica accompaniment, is the outstanding number. The rest range through passable to poor to punk in the final sequence where they have this nice little girl togged out in a miniature Dietrich model of white satin tails and top hat. There's no denying the Temple talents, but a few more pictures like this will thin out her fans.

★ The Captain's Kid
(Warners)

This should go pretty good for the Saturday matinee, but aside from that audience we're afraid it won't meet with too enthusiastic a recepton. Sybil Jason is the girl around whom the story is woven, but it's Guy Kibbee who makes the most worth while contribution. He gives a really grand characterization of the old sea captain, who divides his time between his beloved boat and the town jail. The captain's kid, Sybil Jason, is the niece of May Robson, a domineering old lady with whom Kibbee has been in love for lo, these fifty years. Miss Robson is too capable in her role, shouting and carrying on in great style between trying to keep Sybil from seeing anything of the captain, and keeping her other niece, Jane Bryan, from seeing too much of Fred Lawrence, the captain's helper. What might laughingly be called the plot has to do with some buried treasure. Sybil finds an old map telling the whereabouts of the buried loot, so she and the captain set sail to find it. This trip gives Sybil an excuse to air a song and dance and Guy a better chance to shoot a man which leads to a long and harrowing trial. One scene in the prison cell between the small star and Mr. Kibbe proves that Sybil really has what it takes. But more care as to story and direction will be needed if she is not to be typed as just too, too cute.

★ The Longest Night (M-G-M)

Mystery, murder, laughs and love are turned at such a fast and furious rate here that you probably won't mind about it all being pretty trite stuff. Robert Young carries most of it off with his familiar, but competent, playboy antics. A large department store, which has fallen to his lot, provides the story's background. And here the usual cross-section of human beings goes into action. There are crooked clerks, poor-but-honest ones, the weak and the strong, the bright and the balmy. There are also some that aren't a bit hard on the eyes—chiefly Julie Haydon and Florence Rice. Robert, when he finally shows up to tend to business, promptly falls in love with Florence. The fact that Julie is her sister and also in cahoots with the gang that's railroading the dirty work in the store, makes things a bit complicated. The plot may be found wanting, but there's no shortage in intrigue, excitement and corpses. It's a big dose, but if you can take this sort of thing you'll be well diverted for an hour. Ted Healy, Sidney Toler and Catherine Doucet furnish their usual good comedy.

(Paramount)

If you are a Boland-Ruggles fan, you will find this one of their better pictures. Even if you have no yen for their particular type of antics, you will still find yourself chuckling over this one and overlooking the fact that the story is overdrawn and overplayed in many instances. Charlie and Mary have been married some twenty years. Twenty years have not blighted their love for one another, but Adolphe Menjou manages it in twenty minutes. The author of a best-seller on the horrors of wedlock, he comes to visit the happy couple and informs Mary Boland that she and her husband are just contented vegetables. Having seen the light, Mary is miserable over the fact that Charlie has made her so happy. So he obligingly turns to wine, women and song in order to make his wife miserable enough to make her contented again. Adolphe Menjou is not at his best with such obvious comedy and Vivienne Osborne plays the siren role with too heavy a foot on the hard pedal. However, she has one scene that's a wow when she attempts to get Menjou down to brass tacks on the marriage question. Claude Gillingwater, Louise Beavers and Fay Holden are well cast in minor roles.

★ Three Married Men
(Paramount)

Based on the trials and tribulations of three married men, this turns out to be anything but the gloomy picture one would expect. The fact that Roscoe Karns, William Frawley and Lynne Overman are the gentlemen in the case has a good deal to do with it. Lynne and Bill are Mary Brian's brothers and Roscoe is her intended groom. She finally marries the guy, in spite of the fact that her brothers and her entire family do all in their power to avert the disaster. Mary's family is not the only one which views the wedding with alarm, for Roscoe's is equally apprehensive. It all dates back to a family feud that started forty years ago. There was as much point to the feud as there is to this picture, but both are lively enough. George Barbier is responsible for a lot of chuckles, as are Marjorie Gateson, Betty Ross Clarke and Mabel Colcord, a few of the in-laws. Mary Brian looks prettier than ever and handles her role capably.

(20th Century-Fox)

This film is one of those things. You can take it or leave it. You can take, for instance, Arthur Treacher's amusing and sometimes hilarious performance as the impeccable "gentleman's gentleman" made famous by the P. G. Wodehouse stories. You can also take the nice light comedy of David Niven in the role of Bertie Wooster, Jeeves' slightly demented master. As for the other characters, the direction and most of the script, faint praise is much too good for them. The scenarists have relied too much on stock situations, and the director went to too many pains to make the obvious even more so. The result is an unsatisfactory picture, but one which makes one hope the Niven-Treacher combination will be allowed to perform again under more favorable auspices.

★ Murder with Pictures
(Paramount)

There were so many people chasing each other in this one that we were too dizzy to get the last sequences straight. However, it no doubt turned out logically—to the director at least—and the cast seemed to be having a fine time. We hope they did anyway, for they were a good crowd—Gail Patrick, Lew Ayres, Paul Kelly, Benny Baker, Ernest Cossart and Joyce Compton among others. The plot keeps up a lively pace and is not without complications if you don't object to tricks. Dialogue is snappy, too, full of wisecracks that you can't help laughing at again.

$1.00 Prize Letter
Gable Fans' Rally

I've seen every one of Gable's thirty-odd pictures. I've seen him dirty and messy in "San Francisco"; sinister in "Night Nurse"; comic in "It Happened One Night"; dramatic in "Mutiny on the Bounty" and "Men in White." Would the handsome Bob Taylor be able to play such varied roles with the same sincerity that Gable does? I think not. Would he remain as fascinating if he acted in an earthquake or war scene, with the subsequent change in his appearance? Again, I think not. Have you heard the men say they find qualities in him to admire as they say about Gable? I haven't.

I've read that Taylor's fan mail proves him more popular than Gable. My idea is that after five years of continued popularity such as Gable has been enjoying, some of us take his fine performances a little for granted and don't let him know how tremendously popular he still is. So come on, Gable fans, let's tell Mr. M-G-M that, while we think perfect, handsome boys are all right, we'd rather ignore big ears in a man who, although only attractive and charming, can really act.—Eleanor Kammerer, New York, N. Y.

The Good Earth

food—he feared one would steal it. In this house, we throw such meat to dogs."

"In Shantung, I knew a kitchen girl and they gave her to a farmer. He beat her twelve times in two days and then sent her back."

Malicious laughter. The inevitable sniggering of the mongrel breed in the presence of the humble and lowly. Then a harsh, authoritative voice sent the tormentors scattering. Cuckoo, stewardess of Lord Hwang's great house. . . .

"Why are you sitting there, fool?" she cried to the immobile figure by the sink. "Are you ready? Is that your box? Open it—we'll see if everything in it is yours."

The pitiful belongings were tumbled and tossed about.

"These! When did you steal these?" A bracelet—a cheap string of wooden beads were in Cuckoo's hand. O-lan answered in her slow, flat voice, "My mother gave them to me."

"Well, pick up your rags." Cuckoo flung the pathetic trinkets to the ground. "The Old Mistress waits."

The Old Mistress of the House of Hwang bid fair, for sheer boredom or the drowsiness induced by her ever-present opium pipe, never to complete the perfunctory statements which rendered O-lan the wife and chattel of Wang the farmer. With long intervals of silence, she mumbled the necessary words. She said carelessly that O-lin was a virtuous maid—naturally, since she was too ugly to pleasure the Princes of the house. Wang must bring the first son to the Great House on the first day of the New Year. Well, and what were they waiting for? Begone! Begone!

The feast—the very small feast—was a great success, the food cunningly seasoned with this and that of herbs. The guests were farmers from the neighborhood and—grudging hospitality!—Wang's uncle and cousin. His uncle, a shiftless, plausible fellow, ever borrowing, never giving; the cousin, viciously wise beyond his years. But what would you? The gods punish those who do not honor their father's generation. Heard above the cousin's ribald jokes were many praises for the feast.

"Oh, it is poor food—and ill prepared," said Wang and his father politely.

In the kitchen, O-lan smiled with quiet pleasure as she heard these testimonies to her skill. And what thoughts were there, behind her plain, stolid face? Perhaps she thought how Wang, when he saw her staggering under the load of her heavy box, had taken it from her and had given her only the light basket of food to carry. Perhaps she thought how, at a fruit vender's, he had bought her peaches, and had not reprimanded her when she dared to eat. Perhaps she thought how, passing the uncle's ramshackle hut, he had, with the sudden anger of the meek, thrown the cousin into the gutter with one twist of his mighty arm, when the cousin had jeered at her plain face and unbound feet. (And then, to be sure, hastily invited the cousin and his father to that night's feast, which invitation was as hastily accepted.)

O-lan took something in her hand and went out the kitchen door. The guests were leaving . . . her work was done. She knelt down under the stars and dug with her hands in the rich, good earth. She was patting and replacing the soil when Wang the farmer came out and found her there. Hastily, as though to ward off a blow, she put up her hand.

"The peach seed . . . A tree will grow from it," said O-lan.

Wang's voice was kindly, though his face betrayed no emotion:

"Why did you put up your hand? Were you afraid?"

O-lan nodded, almost imperceptably.

"They were not good to you in the Great House?" Again, a slight movement of the head. "No!"

"I shall be good to you." Wang raised his lantern and held it over her head. Its rays brought something into the woman's face that had not been there before. Tears—unaccustomed—and a beauty that was unaccustomed, too.

IT seemed to Wang, during the next months, that life was a luxury indeed. In the morning, water was brought, and he did not bring it. In the evenings, food was prepared, and food with a difference he well could comprehend. One day, he observed that his blue cotton clothing was ever clean and mended, and the clothing of his father, too. No longer did vermin infest the bedding. And when this or that household implement was broken, no longer was it thrown away, nor was there talk of money to replace it, but it appeared again, neatly mended and as good as new. He wondered about this woman, who gave no talk beyond replies to his questions. And then he upbraided himself for wondering. After all, she was only a woman. . . .

Wang, in his rice field, bent and lifted his great strong back in the patient rhythm of labor. The sun was passing hot, but there was much still to be done. A shadow fell across his path—O-lan, a hoe on her shoulder. Wang glanced at her curiously.

"There is no work in the house until nightfall," said the flat voice, and she fell into rhythm beside him.

They worked together under the blazing sun, their clothing clinging like skin to their bodies. On and on, without word or pause. After a long time. O-lan said, "I am with child."

She went on with her work until Wang took the hoe from her. His voice was thick in his throat. "Enough for today. We'll tell my father."

Once within the house, Wang followed the woman into the kitchen.

"I know nothing of these things," he murmured. "When the child is born, you'll need a woman. Perhaps there's one in the Great House—someone you knew in the kitchen?"

"No one in that house!" O-lan's flat voice quickened with intensity. Then, more soberly, "When I go back to that house, it will be with my son in my arms. I'll have a red coat on him, and red flowered trousers, and a hat with a gilded Buddha, and tiger-faced shoes. And I'll go into the kitchen where I spent my days as a slave, and into the Great Hall where the Old Mistress sits with her pipe, and I'll show myself and my son to all of them."

Not before had Wang heard this woman speak at such length. He looked upon her with amazement. Then, gruffly, "I suppose you'll need some money?"

"If you will give me three pieces of silver? It is a great deal, but I will not waste any of it."

Wang reached into his garments and brought out silver. He counted three pieces into O-lan's hand—then carefully added a fourth. "After all, he is the first!" he said.

O-lan's hands were clutched tight to her breast. Her voice came in a hoarse whisper. "This is the first time . . . I have ever held silver money in my hand!"

The harvest came, and was stored safely, but with great labor against a threat of storm. And O-lan worked in the fields with her child nigh born, the pain so great that she could scarce lift the gathered wheat. And at last, against her will, she crawled back to the house, crept to her room, carrying a fresh split reed for what must be done—alone. "No one from that house!" No one, while the wind soared and the rain came down and the farmers worked at impossible speed—Wang and Ching and Ching's wife and even the old father—all, all except Wang's uncle, who glanced up from his game of cards in town and said, "How sorry, my harvest will be spoiled. But my nephew Wang, he is a good and kindly man and will take pity on his poor uncle, whose wife bears him only daughters and whose fields bear him only weeds."

THE storm gone, the uncle and the uncle's wife hurried to the brother's house to see what they could see. They saw wheat neatly stacked in shelter, and from the inner room there came a lusty cry and the uncle's wife, slatternly, but good-natured withal, hurried within, bustling and calling that here indeed was work to be done—after all work was over. And then came Wang, famished and weary from his labor, and he seized a bowl of rice hastily and then he too heard the cry and hurried to the inner room, thrusting aside the exclamations of his father's brother and the aunt.

The child was wrapped in a pair of Wang's old trousers, as was the custom. O-lan was kneeling beside a chest, folding some garment. Another cry—a man child's cry—rent the air and Wang, seeing the little fists of his son waving with baby strength, took that for a sign of recognition and his heart swelled as if it would burst.

On New Year's day, they went to the Great House. O-lan replied not one word to the sarcasm of Cuckoo. The Old Mistress muttered drowsily that it was a fine child. Wang, silver in his garments from the year's harvest, bought from the Great House a strip of land adjacent to his own. Hard-won silver to him—a bit of coin, to the Old Mistress that would perhaps still her craving for yet another day. And there was a great feast that night in Wang's home.

There was yet another feast—but smaller, as was seemly—a certain time after that, when Younger Son was born. And no feast at all, the third time when the first girl came—a mere slave, but what would you? The gods cannot smile on one man eternally. And each year, Wang added to his fields until there were five besides his own original one.

Then, one summer, when Elder Son was eight years of age, the sun shone as it never had before and planting had gone apace, but the sun continued to shine blandly and unceasingly, and there was no rain to water the crops. In the house of Wang, the merest trifle of water was used for household needs and all was poured onto the soil. When one field withered and died, Wang thought, "I have yet four more," but a second turned brown and useless and then a third and when his uncle came begging for a little silver "to tide him over till harvest day," O-lan strove for the first time to curb her husband's generosity. O-lan who remembered the days of famine in her childhood when she had been sold as a slave into the Great House. Then, day after day, they scanned the heavens, which shone with a wicked brightness, until at last they knew there was no hope. What use silver—little though it was—when there was no food? They ate what was stored, eking it out to endless length, and then ground up corn husks for food. O-lan slaughtered the ox, when Wang could not, for the ox had been his friend, and at last the meat was gone and the bones crushed for the marrow that was in them. There was no work to be done and sleep—fitful, nightmare sleep—stilled for a while the craving of their empty bellies.

Then, the last of all the starving village, Wang said, "Let us leave our home and our fields. Let us go South."

In a hut made of straw mats, leaning against the wall of a southern city, O-lan taught her pupils.

"Now, take the bowl in your hand, so. Now, hold it out, so and cry," her stolid voice changed, rose in a wail that would soften a man of stone. "A heart, good sir! A good deed for your life in heaven! The coin you throw away—feed a starving child!"

"Now then, now then!" called Wang in amazement.

O-lan looked at him and her eyes dropped timidly. "So I begged when I was a child—in times like these."

Well, O-lan and the boys and the old father might beg, but Wang would not, he vowed. He rented a ricksha and pulled his vitals out for a few pence a day. Then came a horde of soldiers through the city, seizing this one and that for slaves to bear their arms and bedding, and Wang dared not go out in daylight. Thereafter, he pulled the great vans down by the warehouses at night for less pence in a week than a day's labor in the fields would bring him. And he so often said, "Ah, let us go home and starve if need be—'tis better than here. If I had anything to sell, I'd sell it and go back to the land."

Then O-lan said, "In times like these, my parents found a way to go back—they sold me to the Old Mistress."

Wang caught his breath. "You would sell the Little One?" This girl, now, a mere slave, but she had torn at his heart strings in those last days in the north when O-lan had found means to feed her only by chewing seed, one at a time, and pushing the pulp into the little thing's mouth. So thin, she had been, and the life fluttering back and forth in her till it was a question whether she would go or stay. And now, with little care enough, as children will do, she was plump and merry and a pretty one, though she said no word as yet.

"You would sell the girl?" Wang repeated.

"I'd sell her," O-lan said. "To take you back to the land."

LITTLE GIRL smiled her baby smile. Wang asked, not looking at his wife, "Were you ever beaten in the Great House?"

"Every day I was beaten."

"But this child is pretty—they did not beat the pretty slaves?"

"No," O-lan said. "They didn't beat the pretty ones."

Wang rose to his feet. "If it weren't for me, you'd die before you'd sell her. We won't sell her—not if I spend my life in this wilderness."

And then later, in response to his misery, O-lan said, "Wait yet a little. There is talk about. When the rich are too rich, and the poor are too poor, things come to pass."

"When the rich are too rich". . . . Things came to pass indeed, one day. There was a rush of soldiers' feet in the streets and Wang stayed within the hut, for fear of being taken to the wars. But O-lan went out and was pushed along with the crowd—through the town, through the gates of a noble house. And on and on she went, not comprehending, but merely going. Through outer courts, from which slaves with pearls in their shoes had fled, through inner courts where there was no man, and at last into a private inner room, and here was a huge mountain of a man, his rolls of yellow flesh quivering with fright. He stared at O-lan, with terror causing his eyes to pop out of his head, and he said, "My life! My life! Take these, but spare my life!" He thrust a heavy pouch into her hands and she took it, still uncomprehending. When he was gone, she dared look, and in her hand she saw glittering red and green stones and white stones, too, but these were not the white she had known, but white with a fire that she had never seen.

After a long time, strong arms came and bore her away into the outer court where were many like herself and the soldiers were lining them up in groups against the wall. From a tattered wretch a stolen satin garment was torn and he was thrown against the wall, too. O-lan shrunk back as far as she could—the pouch of jewels was in her garments but they would find it—they would find it!

"You thieves shall be taught a lesson!" thundered one in a strange garb. There was a roar of gunfire and the line against the wall dropped. Never crying out, but trembling as though with an ague, O-lan kept shrinking back, back—her thoughts of the little ones, Wang, the old father. Then the commanding voice rose again:

"We are Republicans, not bandits. We come to free the city, not to kill. You have seen what happens to thieves. Go your way—but remember, anyone caught looting shall be shot!"

The memory of that time in the southern city passed, as the memory of a nightmare. And the northern farmland came to harvest—to many harvests—again, with the seed that the southern jewels had bought. Neighbor Ching joined his labors to Wang's. Elder Son learned the ways of writing and figuring in the town and could manage the sale of his father's grain. Younger Son, a strange child, was set upon the study of this new-fangled agriculture—a kind of book, Wang believed, which could make the heavens rain just enough and not too much. Little Girl only remained the same. She spoke no words at all beyond her baby jargon and sat in the sun all day, twisting a bit of cloth. Wang often thought to himself, "Suppose we had sold this poor mouse and they had found her this way. They would have killed her." And so he was always gentle and kind with her. O-lan took up her busy life where she had left it, and if a strange fire in her vitals sometimes caused her to sink to the earth in pain, no one ever knew or saw.

One day, in the shop of Liu, the grain merchant, there was men's talk, after business had been transacted, of the new tea shop and sly smiles passed between Liu and Wang's uncle—ever present with his oily tongue and itching fingers—and would not Wang the farmer, nay, Wang the merchant!—care to stop there for a little fragrant wine and perhaps an hour's pleasure with a pretty girl? What harm?

Wang said uncomfortably, "But I don't want any girl. No girls! No girls!"

However, impelled by curiosity, drawn on by flattery, he went to the tea shop and when rice and wine were set before him, a singularly familiar voice was heard.

"Well, and it's Wang the farmer!" Cuckoo, by the gods, her shrewish face no older, her shrewish voice no softer. And the guile of the uncle and the guile of Cuckoo led Wang to an inner room where there were dream women's portraits on the wall, and though he gruffly feigned disinterest, there was one with a little pink face and tiny curling hands before which he stopped and stared.

"Her hands are so small," he said as though to himself.

"She has little hands—and little feet—and a little pointed face like a flower," said the voice of Cuckoo behind him.

"And she is real?"

Cuckoo smiled. "Put a little silver in my hand and I will place her before you."

FIRST a little silver—then a great stream of silver—poured from Wang's hands from that day forth. To the despair of O-lan, he cut off his long queue. And no longer would her stoutly made garments do for him—he must have this and that of silken cloth tailored for him in the town. And the day came, at last, when he bought the Great House of Hwang, now falling and rotted from within. The rabble that dwelt in the courts were turned away and lilies bloomed again in fragrant pools and more silver went for chests and screens. And Lotus to the very innermost court was brought, with Cuckoo to wait on her. Wang had said to O-lan,

"There is a woman. Not such a one as you—not as good as you . . ."

"But she is beautiful?" O-lan's voice was very low, and her breath difficult, as though she suffered pain.

"She is beautiful," Wang had replied.

O-lan's hands pressed tightly together, to still a cry that a double pain would wring from her. "You are a man," was all she said.

Wang forced down something like pity that rose within him. "It's like a sickness. When I'm with her, it's not enough. When I'm not with her, there is nothing. Even the land is nothing. . . ."

O-lan answered quietly, "Then it will be better when she's in your house."

For a space of time, Wang slaked the thirst of his love and it seemed that peace was upon him. So long as there was silver, Lotus' pretty eyes did not fill with tears and her upbraiding did not ring in his head. So long as there was silver, Ching paid the laborers and managed all there was to do on the land. Yes, silver brought a man peace.

But then, at first there was gossip, to which Wang paid no heed. Gossip that Elder Son went often to the inner court and that Lotus found him pleasing. O-lan, speaking slowly and painfully, urged that Elder Son be married speedily to some maid, but Wang replied that there was time—there was yet time! At last the evil thought grew in Wang's mind so great that he paid a sudden visit to the inner court—and met the ugly truth face to face. He beat Lotus until her meagre little soul was imprinted forever with a respect for her lord. And he shouted that Elder Son should go—should leave his house forever!

Elder Son would have gone, fierce and uncompromising in his youthful pride, but on that very day, a cloud fell across the sky and a laborer brought to Wang a dead thing—a small dead thing that presaged yet another evil that silver could not render non-existent. Locusts! In the distance, the sky was black with them. And Wang rushed out upon his land for the first time in many months.

Elder Son came running forth to see what the panic was about. O-lan stirred painfully from her place in the kitchen, but fell back again, her face twisted anew with the fire in her vitals.

Then Younger Son spoke: "My father, the new scholars say that one should burn the outlying fields. Make a great fire, and the locusts will be burned and so you will save the inner fields."

This unheard of thing! This wicked thing! To burn one's fields! But Younger Son spoke with unwonted vehemence and at last it was done and the flying things dropped to the earth in hordes and most of Wang's land was saved.

Then, indeed, sanity returned to him and he saw Lotus for the pretty, but faithless thing she was. She might stay, but no longer would he sicken and die at her slightest frown. Then, indeed, he looked more closely at O-lan and saw that the fire within her vitals was burning her life away and he spoke hastily of getting a doctor—the best—she should have the best.

But O-lan, speaking ever slowly, told him that it was of no use. If he would see to the marriage of Elder Son? If Wang would forgive Elder Son, and see that this thing was done?

"It shall be done," Wang said.

. . . In a plain room in the great house, O-lan sat, raised up in her bed. There was chatter and merriment without and it made her happy to hear it. There was rice, there were sweet cakes, there was wine—she had seen to it all. The bride was a pretty maid—and proper. The uncle's voice rose, pompously proclaiming a toast to the groom. Jokes—ribald laughter.

So it had been—but little different, after all—many years ago. Now she could rest and wait for this thing inside of her to come and take her.

Wang came to her side. "You must get your strength. The learned doctor has guaranteed your life to me for five thousand pieces of silver."

O-lan put out her hand and touched his cheek.

"I cannot—forgive me."

"But this I cannot bear!" cried Wang in anguish. "I'd sell my land, if I could heal you."

O-lan murmured with difficulty, "No . . . and I would not . . . let you . . . for I must die sometime. But the land is there after me." She motioned to Wang to lift her up, and he raised her tenderly in his strong arms. "It is raining," said O-lan. "The land . . ."

Slowly, she sank back in his arms and he laid her gently upon the bed. The sound of the rain grew stronger, beating down upon the earth. Wang went out into the court and raised his face up to the midnight black sky.

"O-lan!" his lips moved. "O-lan! You are—you are the earth!"

"Your Autograph, Please?"

and looked at me for a moment, startled. Then she laughed outright and, taking my book signed, saying, "All right, you win."

As I turn the pages of my book I come to the autograph of Mae West. It took me a long time to get that one. The first time I tried proved a dismal failure. I had sighted her one night pushing her way through a crowd. Stepping between her and her car, I proceeded to ask Miss West for her signature. Before I had a chance to say a word she reached out, pushed me aside, and instead of inviting me to "Come up and see me sometime," she said, as only she can, "Out of my way, son." Instead of discouraging me, those words made me want that signature all the more. I vowed that some day I'd get it, and I did. Recognizing her car as it stood at the curb outside of "Jim's," Hollywood beauty salon, I parked myself alongside the machine, determined to stay there until Mae came out—even if it took all night.

But apparently that had been tried before. I had hardly placed myself alongside the car, when out came one of the beauty operators with the suggestion that if I sent my book in to Miss West she would gladly sign it. The operator explained that Miss West generally did this to save herself from being mobbed by autograph seekers who also might attract an unmanageable crowd. Curious, I asked this operator how Miss West knew that I was waiting for her autograph. "Her chauffeur told her," she answered. "He has been trained to smell out autograph hounds." Wow!!!

These tricks to get away from autograph collectors like myself, have only one result—they have forced the autograph seekers to develop ingenious methods of their own to get at the stars. It's the old, old story of the burglar-proof safe, which is only burglar-proof until some thief invents a means of getting inside it. In my own case these tricks have forced me to learn, for one thing, the license numbers, makes and types of automobiles owned by the various stars. I gained this valuable information by spotting these machines as they waited outside the various eating places, theatres, night spots and shops.

For instance, I can really tell you offhand the exact color and other distinguishing features of Norma Shearer's Rolls Royce sedan. It's one car I can tell a mile away by its flashy chromium. Of course, Gary Cooper's car is a cinch. It is the only one of its particular type in the United States—a big powerful Dusenberg, which should be able to beat most of the ordinary race cars on the average American track. As yet I haven't had a chance to see Gary's new car. But I'll spot it soon.

Eddie Robinson's automobile is also a cinch. Not because it is the only one of its kind in the country, but because of its peculiar shade of blue, which is different from any I have ever seen. Incidentally, here is one thing you can always be sure of where that gas-buggy is concerned. Whenever you see it on the road, Eddie will be behind its wheel, nervously chewing on the end of a big black cigar.

To disclose all my tricks would undoubtedly mean good-by autographs. However, here is one you may find interesting. At least it has gained me a lot of autographs—those of Barbara Stanwyck, Elissa Landi, Gene Raymond, Robert Montgomery and Ann Dvorak, to mention a few. While stars are busy plodding their way through crowds, I hide myself in their cars. When they open the door, I pop up. Startled, they generally sign my book before having a chance to recover their composure. It's great fun—except when I have to worry about bodyguards.

Very often autograph seekers are forced to co-operate with one another. Here is one example of such co-operation. It added Jean Harlow's signature to my collection. Learning that Miss Harlow was having lunch in a popular Hollywood restaurant, I gathered together a group of autograph collectors—who had already obtained her signature—and induced them to stand in front of the eating place. I knew that Miss Harlow would hear of it, and figured she would be frightened into sneaking out the back way. That is just what she did. And when she came out the back entrance, there I was waiting for her, with a big grin and book in hand.

Even the youngsters have their place in autograph collecting, as I found out the time I got Wally Beery's signature. Late one night I had waited about two hours for him to come out of the Beverly Brown Derby. When he did, about 'steen autograph seekers suddenly appeared from nowhere. It was too much for Wally. He started to duck—when up piped a small girl in the group (she was about twelve years old), "Oh! Mr. Beery!"

"What are you doing up so late at night?" he shot back at her.

"I've been waiting up to get your autograph—and the least you can do is give it to me," was her rejoinder. What could Wally do? Naturally he signed all the books thrust at him.

I always believed that Connie Bennett was "snooty." Here's what made me change my mind. I saw her sitting in her car, in front of an exclusive film colony dress shop. She was giving autographs through the window. I tried to shove my book at her, but the crowd was too thick. I stepped to the other side of her car, and tried to gain her attention there. It was no use. Exasperated, I took the liberty of opening the door of her machine, got in and sat down beside her. First she was startled (that's a big secret, startle them, take them off their guard), then she grinned, took my book and asked me for my pen. I started to look for it and found it gone. What a time to lose a pen! Embarrassing moments. But Miss Bennett proved a good sport. She took her own pen out of her purse and cheerfully signed her name in my, now almost filled, autograph book.

The one autograph I value the most was among the easiest to get. It's Loretta Young's. It wasn't the getting that makes it valuable to me, but the way it was given. I got it at a preview of "White Parade," which starred Miss Young and John Boles. Loretta was in the theatre at the time of the preview. I saw her as she was leaving through the lobby. From the balcony I made it downstairs in less than nothing flat. I had never missed one of her pictures, and felt that I knew her.

Loretta shook hands with me and discussed the film for several minutes, wringing me dry of any ideas I might have had about "White Parade." Then with a smile she signed my book, and thanking me, asked where I was from. When I said Boston, she remarked she was glad to meet a true Bostonian, especially since "Boston" was her nickname in the picture. Believed it good luck. Her charm, pleasantness and cordiality absolutely amazed me. I could hardly believe that so famous a person could be so nice to a total stranger. I have since learned that Loretta Young is everything she showed herself to be that night, a sweet, young, beautiful and sincere motion picture actress. How easy it would be on us autograph seekers if all screen stars were like her!

Yet, though many aren't, when I sum up what I have told you, I find myself with the grand total of three hundred and eighty-five autographs—everyone a "big timer."

Eye-taking Loveliness

[UNTIL SHE SMILES]

She evades close-ups . . . Dingy teeth and tender gums destroy her charm . . . She ignored the warning of "Pink Tooth Brush"

If only this lovely girl could stand forever as you see her here—serene, beautiful, goddess-like! But when she smiles—when lovely lips part and reveal dull teeth and dingy gums—how quickly and tragically the spell of beauty is broken.

NEVER NEGLECT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

It may not seem dangerous—that first warning "tinge of pink" on your tooth brush. It may seem trivial, unimportant. But your dentist will tell you it can be and has been the prologue to many a dental tragedy. Remember—"pink tooth brush" is a distress signal, and only a distress signal. But when you see it, play safe—see your dentist. The chances are that it does not mean a serious gum disorder—but your dentist should make the decision. Usually, however, it only means gums that have grown tender and flabby under our modern soft food menus—gums that need more exercise, more stimulation—and as so many dentists will often advise—gums that need the help of Ipana and massage.

For Ipana, with massage, is designed to help benefit your gums as well as clean your teeth. Rub a little extra Ipana onto your gums every time you brush your teeth. Lazy gums awaken. Circulation stimulates gum tissues. You'll soon sense a new, healthy firmness in the gum walls themselves.

Ipana Tooth Paste and massage is approved by many modern dentists, taught by many modern teachers in classrooms all over the country. Don't take chances. Even before you see that "tinge of pink" on your own tooth brush, even before you have this first warning of danger—schedule yourself for this modern dental health routine with Ipana and massage. Don't risk being a "dental cripple." Change to Ipana and massage, and help keep your smile lovely, bright, sparkling—and safer.

For Real Beauty
YOU MUST HAVE A SOFT, ALLURING SKIN ... FREE FROM PIMPLES

SMOOTH, satiny shoulders—lovely skin "all over"—a radiantly clear, youthful complexion—men admire them and modern style demands them.

To be truly lovely, you must rid your skin of ugly pimples on face and body. And thousands are doing it, with complete success.

The real cause of disorders resulting in ugly pimples may be nothing in the world except a lack of the yeast vitamins B and G. When these elements are not present in the human diet in sufficient quantities, the intestinal tract becomes weak and sluggish. Its function is badly impaired. Constipation is likely to ensue and this, in turn, often shows up in pimply skin.

Countless men and women have found that in such cases, Yeast Foam Tablets work wonders. This pure dry yeast supplies vitamins B and G in abundant quantities and thus tends to restore the intestinal tract to normal—in those instances of vitamin deficiency. With the intestinal tract again in healthy function, pimples should quickly disappear.

Start now. Try Yeast Foam Tablets and give them the chance to give you the same welcome relief they have brought to so many others.

Ask your druggist for Yeast Foam Tablets today—and refuse substitutes.

'LOST HORIZON'

It is our pleasure this month to congratulate all those who participated in making "Lost Horizon" the winner of Modern Screen's award for distinguished pictures.

A bravo to Director Frank Capra for his discerning work in preserving the flavor of the James Hilton book of the same name. And more bravos for the moving portrayals given by Ronald Colman, Isabel Jewell and Jane Wyatt, together with the fine work of Margo, Edward Everett Horton and John Howard.

Every month Modern Screen is awarding a medal to the most outstanding about-to-be-released production. Watch for this monthly award and let it be your guide to the month's best picture.

Modern Screen's Hollywood editor, Leo Townsend, presents our Medal to the director of "Lost Horizon," Frank Capra.

Modern Screen's Medal-Award Picture, "Lost Horizon," a Columbia production, reviewed by Leo Townsend

MODERN SCREEN
AWARD FOR EXCEPTIONAL MERIT

When James Hilton's "Lost Horizon" appeared in the bookshops in 1934 it was hailed by critics and the paying customers as one of the finest and most interesting novels in recent years. Director Frank Capra, who numbers among his successes "It Happened One Night" and "Mr. Deeds Goes To Town" persuaded Columbia Studios to buy "Lost Horizon," and now, after more than a year's preparation, it comes to the screen as his most splendid celluloid achievement, as well as the most ambitious offering in Columbia's history.

The screenplay, by Robert Riskin, differs somewhat from the novel, but the changes were heartily approved by the author. It tells of a band of Englishmen and Americans, escaping bandits in a flight from Baskul to Shanghai, who suddenly discover their plane, piloted by a strange-appearing Oriental, is headed completely off its course. Passengers include Robert Conway (Ronald Colman), an author in the British diplomatic service at Baskul, his brother George (John Howard), Barnard (Thomas Mitchell), an international swindler, Lovett (Edward Everett Horton), a scientist, and Gloria (Isabel Jewell), a prostitute. Their mysterious journey takes them miles beyond the rim of civilization, high into a plateauland near Tibet, where they are met by a caravan of Chinese who conduct them across tortuous mountain paths until they finally reach a valley and the most beautiful sight they've ever seen. It is the lamasery of Shangri-La. Ruled by a high lama said to be over 300 years old, Shangri-La is a garden spot of contentment where time is unknown and whose inhabitants are blessed with eternal youth. It is occupied entirely by Orientals except for two young women, Sondra Bizet (Jane Wyatt) and Maria (Margo), a Russian who, despite her supposed sixty odd years, has the appearance of a girl of sixteen.

Life in Shangri-La soon becomes a happy existence for all of the travelers but George, who longs for the outside world. After a time he succeeds in convincing his brother that the lamasery's eternal youth is a myth, and together with Maria they leave Shangri-La to return to the outer civilization. Their journey is beset with hardships, and Maria, without the charm of Shangri-La, becomes once more an old woman. George, realizing his mistake, takes his life, but Bob Conway continues on.

Later, aboard a ship headed for England, Conway realizes this world has lost its appeal for him and he disappears from it once more, hoping to find his way back to the lamasery.

A year or so later, there are reports of a lone man wandering across Tibet. It is Conway, seeking Shangri-La—searching for his Lost Horizon.

Even the most critical and exacting readers of the original "Lost Horizon" will have to concede that Ronald Colman makes the ideal person to interpret the Hilton leading character, Bob Conway. Colman, with his usual finesse, gives a smooth, sympathetic and inspired performance.

Isabel Jewell, who has struggled valiantly for recognition from the Hollywood powers-that-be, has a chance again to prove that she is a fine dramatic actress. And Jane Wyatt, recruited from the stage and Park Avenue, is proof enough that the talent scouts are good spotters. She possesses both charm and ability. Margo plays her role with intelligence and an unexpected flair for characterization in the scenes where she has to grow old, and John Howard, as the restless member of the Shangri-La group, has that box office combination of good looks and sincerity in his portrayal.

Is Mr. Gable Too Self-Satisfied?

Recently in a Modern Screen interview Clark Gable spoke as follows: "Can you imagine me talking with an accent? You bet you can't. If I do play the part, I'll just talk like I always do. I'll be myself or nothing." (The part Mr. Gable was referring to was the title role in "Parnell.")

And in those few words, Mr. Gable covered the thing that seems to be wrong with most of the Hollywood actors and actresses; they appear to feel that all they need be is mere animated photographs of themselves. Not one out of ten really ever creates a part.

It seems strange that Mr. Gable should feel that he needn't make the effort to learn an accent, but that all he need do to please his public is just to go on being himself. All the great actors and actresses of the past, and a number of stage performers of today, never hesitated to submerge their own personalities and spent months remaking themselves into the people they were asked to portray. Surely Mr. Gable doesn't feel that the public will be content to go on indefinitely being satisfied with seeing him be himself, no matter what characterization the play may call for.

Why not have more display of histrionic ability, and less display of moving pictures of Hollywood personalities? — Kathryn Vaughan, Kent, Conn.

Your Age, Please, Simone?

Would it be asking too much to suggest that the new French actress, Simone Simon, tell someone her real age, and then stick to it? I have picked up three diffent screen magazines in as many days. The first said, "She's 25, but looks 18." The second: "She's 22, but looks 15." The third: "She's nineteen, but looks—"

Oh, well, by next month she'll be running Shirley Temple stiff competition, and in comparison Baby Leroy we would believe is a grandpa!

After all, the girl has plenty of charm and looks to see her through without all this simpering age business. Who cares if she lies about a couple of years? But couldn't she make up her mind, and stick to it?—R. D. Eaton, Sacramento, Calif.

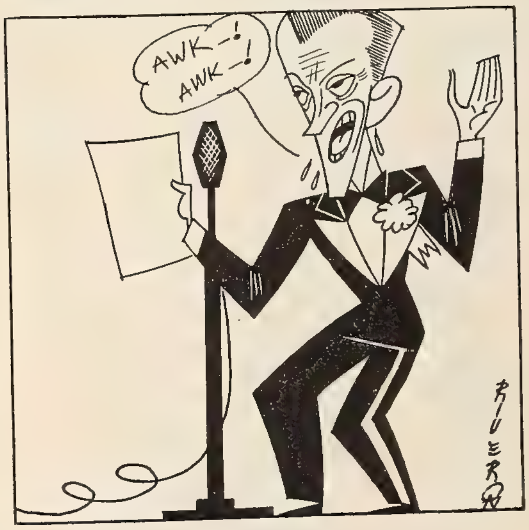
Putting Astaire Wise

Why doesn't someone put Fred Astaire wise to the fact that he's killing himself. No, not in pictures. They're okay. In fact, there's nothing I like better than a swell Astaire-Rogers hit. But this business of radio broadcasting—Fred is one of the many stars who has to be seen to be enjoyed. He's tops as a dancer but his singing is decidedly weak. Anyone knows that it's the Astaire personality that puts over his songs for him. And there's no use arguing about his ready wit. Sure, he has plenty of it, but Charlie Butterworth is no foil for him.



How many of you agree that radio is not Astaire's medium, that he should stick to the screen?

My advice to Astaire is to stick to pictures and Ginger Rogers until he can thrill his radio audience through television.—Betty Taylor, Montreal, Canada.

Send In Your Votes Now!

Shirley Temple has been in the limelight for some time now. She has really done justice to the fair sex by placing herself in such a position of respect and admiration that, as a result, the typical American girl-child of today must look, act and respond in the characteristic Shirly manner or the child just isn't typically American. She has succeeded in creating a style of Tiny American Girlhood.

But where, may I ask, is the male child who can possibly set himself up in the same position to the same degree of popularity as a model of American boyhood?

Personally, I should like to witness a contest of one kind or another which would ultimately end in the selection of a candidate for this position and which would make of this ghost-child of my imagination a reality of flesh and blood in the screen world.—Janet McConachie, Sunnyside, L. I., N. Y.

HERE ARE the biographies you have been clamoring for. Whether one is printed or not depends on the number of requests recorded for it. REMEMBER . . . every request counts . . . and mailing the little coupon on this page isn't just another way of satisfying idle curiosity. It's your way of telling Hollywood who's who on the screen. You're the public and you give the orders! So don't keep your flicker interests a deep dark secret.

ROBERT TAYLOR (Last printed October, 1936. Total number of requests since then 302.) Alaska found gold. Oklahoma found oil. Hollywood found Robert Taylor. Paradoxical, too, that this young chap, so quiet, with a life so uneventful, should be the sensation of a Hollywood decade. Born Spangler Arlington Brugh, in the tiny town of Filley, Nebraska, August 5, 1911, he enjoyed a normal boyhood as the son of a comparatively well-to-do country physician. At Doane College, his first alma mater, his interest in dramatics started . . . oddly enough it was the business side that intrigued him, and he looked after arrangements for the club's trips. Not unusual was this early indifference to acting. He was too serious about too many different endeavors to get engrossed in the stage. Gifted cellist, top notch athlete, a really brilliant orator . . . Bob was all three of these. When his cello teacher transferred to Pomona College, Bob followed. Pomona, an hour's drive from Hollywood, was just close enough to screenland for Bob to get some of the necessary movie virus into his blood. He took to acting with a vengeance. The first break came when the casting agent of M-G-M saw his work in the college production of "Journey's End." Conservative break . . . a contract at thirty-five a week. That was getting Bob's services at sweat-shop wages, only nobody knew it. Metro used him for hack work, playing opposite unknown prima-donnas who wanted screen tests. Not even a public appearance until the "Crime Doesn't Pay" series came along. Then he was lent out to various other studios. Generous of Metro . . . if only they had known how truly generous they were. But soon the fan mail began pouring in . . . mysteriously . . . because Bob had had no ballyhoo . . . letters from fans who didn't even know their idol's name . . . had to describe him. Metro, shrewd lion, was too wise to ignore the uncanny intuition of the public. Overnight they made their find a star. Or how would you interpret this list of leading ladies—Dunne, Gaynor, Young, Stanwyck, Garbo, Crawford? The intimate facts about Bob are soon told. He doesn't get nervous before the camera. He never learns his lines until the night before he needs them. He gets up before his alarm rings at seven every morning. He sleeps in a great big bed, wearing the uppers and lowers of his pajamas. He likes meat, hates fruit, drinks about 10 cups of coffee a day. He has a man-servant by the name of Joe who lays out Bob's clothes, which he changes three and four times a day. He feels very tender about Barbara Stanwyck, and they hold hands in the movies. His latest picture, "Camille," with Greta Garbo, should be released any day.

PATRICIA HOYT, Sioux Falls, Iowa—There is no established record for the length of a fan letter. But Charles Boyer thought he was doing pretty well when an Omaha high school gal dropped him a seventy-nine page note.

JOAN BLONDELL (First printing; total number of requests 223.) Things started popping in Joan's life a scant four months after her birth, August 30, 1909. The little tot, scarcely old enough to play with her toes, gave nightly performances in the New York Globe Theatre's production of "The Greatest Love," while backstage, mama, herself a theatrical personage, prepared the ten o'clock bottle. Her education was richly seasoned with vaudeville. Whatever else she may have learned, she certainly should be well up on her geography. No use mentioning the fact that trouper Joan crossed this North American continent fifty-six times. It's so prosaic alongside of her one-night stands in Germany, her split weeks in Australia, her professional tours through China. At the age of sweet sixteen, when most young girls stay home nights doing their algebra and writing love letters to movie crushes, Joan found herself stranded in a Peking hospital, deserted by her troupe, with the option of washing dishes to earn her fare home or else settling forever on the good earth. Maybe she wasn't glad to get back to quiet, staid old Broadway, where nothing ever happens! But, of course, things always do happen to Joan. Opportunity came knocking in the form of a prominent role in "The Trial of Mary Dugan." And from then on, opportunity was a frequent visitor. A role opposite a young fella by the name of Cagney in a show by the name of "Penny Arcade" is what made Hollywood take notice. The call came from Warner Brothers. Joan and Jimmy played their "Penny Arcade" roles all over again for the flickers. The show was re-titled "Sinner's Holiday." Evidently Warners didn't think of Joan as a deserving sinner. She got no holiday. Fourteen pictures at a clip . . . all in one year. Sort of a world's record for hard work or good nature. Love has come twice into Joan's life. The first lucky devil was cameraman George Barnes. The two eloped to Yuma, Arizona in 1932. And on November 2, 1934, Norman Scott Barnes was born. Only ten months later, Joan and George went their separate ways. No need to tell you that Joan's second big moment is Dick Powell, to whom she was married on the 19th of September, 1936. Joan is 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighs about 115 pounds (so long as she watches that diet), has blonde hair and blue-gray eyes. You'll be seeing Joan and Dick soon in "Golddiggers of 1937."

BEATRICE BUTERA, Brooklyn, New York—No wonder you're curious to know how old Shirley Temple really is. You hear so many conflicting accounts. We have been fortunate enough to get a facsimile of her birth certificate which fixes the birth date as April 23rd, 1928. In other words, come next April 23rd, Shirley will be nine years old.

If you would like to see a brief synopsis of your favorite's life in this department, fill in and send us the coupon on this page. And Look—how about saving yourself 2c by pasting your request on one of Uncle Sam's penny postcards? General questions, of course, will also be answered here. If your question is not taken care of here, look for it in your mail box. Address: The Information Desk, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

JOHN ARLEDGE (Last printed, April, 1936. Total number of requests since then 260.) The moral of John Arledge's early life seems to be that if you are a good boy and practise your piano every day, you'll be a "moompitcher" actor when you grow up. Born in Crockett, Texas, March 12, 1907, Johnson Lundy Arledge showed early aptitude for the piano. Immediately upon graduation from the University of Texas, he managed to land a job as one half of a radio piano duo. From radio he turned his attention to vaudeville, and it was the latter which brought him out to Hollywood. By the end of two years of knocking about in vaudeville, Johnny had become footlight-conscious. More than that, he had learned something about the stage. First crack out of the box, he was assigned a role in Pauline Frederick's production of "Crimson Hour." In April, 1931, the gifted young man came to the attention of Fox and he was subsequently cast for roles in "Young Sinners" and "Daddy Long Legs." Later on his work as "Dude" Lester in a road show of "Tobacco Road" got RKO-Radio officials excited about him and his most recent appearances have been with that company. Last year he played featured roles in

"We're Only Human," "Two in Revolt," and "The Big Game." Arledge is a quiet, diffident sort of fellow. Between takes on a set, he is always found in a corner reading a book. He is blond with a natural wave that is the envy of his girl friends. His eyes are gray and soothing and radiate a quiet charm that makes John Arledge a very distinctive person.

ETER BERNSTEIN, Santa Monica, California—Is Vic McLaglen as strong off the screen as on the screen? You bet your boots he is! In filming the "Magnificent Brute" a fight scene had to be retaken several times with the result that Vic was brawling for sixty-eight minutes straight by the stop watch. Figure out how many three-minute rounds that makes. And some time try holding a quarter of a ton ladle aloft for a whole minute.

ROBERT KENT (First printing; total number of requests 310.) Riding master, able seaman, bank-messenger, prize-fighter, farm hand, model . . . add them all up, divide by the magic number and you have the actor, Robert Kent. But be careful not to attribute this checkered career to shiftlessness. Kent has had too much bitter experience in the school of hard knocks to be shiftless. When his father died, Robert was only six. Penniless, his mother managed to scrape enough money together at a secretarial job to see her son through a Brooklyn high-school. After that he was on his own. Kent moved from job to job, though never in the role of drifter, always as seeker. It took him until 1930 to find what he was looking for. Through a modelling job which his six foot tall, out-of-door physique gained for him, he became acquainted with a little group of players which styled itself the Brooklyn Neighborhood Theatre. They gave him his first role in their production of "King Lear." Right then and there Kent knew where his career lay and went after it hammer and tongs. The independence which he had acquired in his years of knocking about did not desert him. He blasted his way from one company to another, and with each new group insisted on more important roles than he had had with the last. Not even Paramount found itself a match for the indomitable fellow. They gave him a contract, but failed to give him the roles he wanted. So Kent had the contract cancelled and went back to the legitimate stage, taking the juvenile lead in May Robson's coast production of "Kind Lady." Once more he was staking his career on his own ability and grit, and once more he proved himself a good bet. Zanuck, the veteran 20th Century-Fox head, admired his acting in the Robson production, signed him, and put him to work immediately. In a very short time he has appeared in "The Country Beyond," "The Crime of Dr. Forbes," and "Dimples." Right now you can see him in "Reunion," with Jean Hersholt and the Quints. Robert has brown hair and blue eyes.

How to make your holiday a festive one in the Holly-

MERRY CHRISTMAS! And what a fine collection of Christmas refreshments I have in store for you this month—delicious treats that are sure to play an important part in making this particular season of the year brighter for you than ever before and that are certain to prove equally popular on many another special occasion.

Harold Lloyd's wife is not only a charming person but a delightful and accomplished hostess with a real interest in cooking and catering and a thorough knowledge of both. So it is with genuine pleasure that I present her recipes for the Lloyds' favorite Christmas foods—some of which will be given here, while still others will be found in our little "Hostess" booklets which the coupon at the end of this article will bring you free of charge.

It took but a few minutes after meeting Mrs. Lloyd and hearing about their holiday plans, to convince me that in all of Hollywood you couldn't find a home where Christmas is ushered in with keener anticipation or celebrated with greater joy. And that's saying a good deal, too, for this moving picture capital of ours is the most Christmas-conscious place I know of. From the day when Santa Claus officially "opens the season" with a gay and colorful parade down the Boulevard to the dawn of the New Year, everybody's attention is focussed on gift giving and entertaining, as stars, studio workers and townsfolk alike enthusiastically celebrate the holidays.

Interest is greatest, naturally, in homes where there are children. So you can well imagine that at the Lloyds', where there are three happy youngsters, the peak of excitement is reached long before Christmas day and continues well on into the New Year.

Of course, all the parties that the Lloyds plan and carry out are enhanced by the fairy-tale setting in which they are given. For, as you doubtless know, their twenty-three acre estate is famed as the most gorgeous place in Beverly Hills. And according to my personal observation it more than lives up to its reputation and provides the most perfect of all possible settings for holiday entertaining. True there may be some folks who would miss the traditional "cold snap" in the air or "blanket of snow" on the ground, so closely associated with Christmas in the minds of many. But that is not the case with Harold, Mildred and their children. In fact, never having known a "white Christmas" the youngsters think it only natural, on December 25th, to be surrounded by green lawns and murmuring brooks, flowering shrubs and landscaped gardens which have never known the icy fingers of old Jack Frost. Instead of tobogganing or ice skating, the Lloyds and their guests indulge in games of badminton or tennis—while golf enthusiasts can play a round or two on Harold's private course. Stranger still, they'll probably end up the afternoon, I was told, (Continued on page 86)

Play safe...take the doctor's judgment about laxatives

YOU choose your family doctor because you have confidence in him. He will never take chances where your welfare is concerned. Even with a little thing like a laxative, doctors have a definite set of standards which guide them in their choice. They know the dangers of using the wrong kind. Before they will give a laxative their approval, it must meet their requirements on these specific points:

WHAT DOCTORS DEMAND OF A LAXATIVE

It should be dependable.
It should be mild and gentle.
It should be thorough.
Its merit should be proven by the test of time.
It should not form a habit.
It should not over-act.
It should not cause stomach pains.
It should not nauseate, or upset digestion.

EX-LAX MEETS EVERY DEMAND

Now, here's a fact that's significant—Ex-Lax checks on each of these specifications. Not merely on two or three. But on all these points that doctors look for in a laxative.

No wonder so many physicians use Ex-Lax in their own families. No wonder millions of careful mothers give it to their children with perfect confidence. For over 30 years the dependable, satisfying performance of Ex-Lax has created universal trust. Today it is used by more people than any other laxative in the world.

CONVINCE YOURSELF OF THE FACTS

Your first trial of Ex-Lax will be a new and pleasant experience. For Ex-Lax is mild and gentle. It is thoroughly effective. It does not over-act. Does not disturb the digestion. It allows your food to be properly assimilated. And these very qualities that make Ex-Lax so ideal for adults are doubly important in their relation to children.

A REAL PLEASURE TO TAKE

Everyone likes Ex-Lax—particularly the youngsters. It tastes just like delicious chocolate. If you have been taking nasty, nauseating cathartics, you'll be grateful for the pleasant flavor of Ex-Lax. At all drug stores in 10c and 25c sizes. If you'd like to try a sample, mail the coupon below.

GUARD AGAINST COLDS!...Remember these common-sense rules for fighting colds: get lots of sleep, eat sensibly, dress warmly, keep out of drafts, keep your feet dry, and keep regular—with Ex-Lax, the Chocolated Laxative.

A TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

By Leo Townsend

William Powell, Jean Harlow and Spencer Tracy make "Libeled Lady" a rare film treat. Myrna Loy's another star in it.

★★ The Magnificent Brute

(Universal)

This is a gusty little number, roaring in a steel-mill setting, and interpreted roisterously by men as tough as the steel they make. The toughest of them all is Victor McLaglen, who swaggers through to a two-fisted triumph as only McLaglen can swagger. You'll probably come home and growl over your steak, tear a telephone book in half, and tell your boss to go where you have wanted to tell him to go for years. McLaglen, of course, is superb as the victorious rival of William Hall for the position of "top man" at the mill. His laughter is a bellow, his strength is prodigious, and his table manners are a miracle of gorging. "Why do you bother to cut your potatoes in half?" asks Jean Dixon, who runs the boarding house and is appalled at his gustatorial speed and capacity. McLaglen roars and reaches across the table for his third steak. McLaglen wins from Hall the worship of the landlady's small son, played by Billy Burrud; the awed respect of all the mill-hands; and Binnie Barnes, the girl who works in the candy shop and who automatically becomes the sweetheart of the "top man" no matter who he is. Hall double crosses McLaglen. But Miss Dixon, now in love with her boarder, learns Hall's plot and gets McLaglen to run the villain out of town.

"The Charge of the Light Brigade" is top notch entertainment for any fan. Errol Flynn and Olivia De Havilland in the leads.

★★★ Libeled Lady

(M-G-M)

Pictures like this are few and far between. It is outstandingly good on every point that goes into the manufacture of a movie. The cast is not only composed of big names, but every member has drawn roles for which he is admirably fitted. Jean Harlow goes slithery again as the grass widow in pursuit of Spencer Tracy, a newspaper man who can't spare ten minutes for the wedding ceremony, particularly after he okays a scandal about a millionaire's daughter, Myrna Loy, and has to hire William Powell, a man-about-the-world, to help him out. Powell's job is to get Myrna madly in love with him and, in order to pave the way for blackmail, he first marries Jean, an idea which only Tracy thinks good—at the time. And, in order to get Myrna, Powell must work through her father, Walter Connolly, whose main interest in life is fishing, a subject which Powell has to learn overnight in his hotel suite with the aid of E. E. Clive, a fishing teacher. The screen play is excellently written with complications piling up as fast as the laughs, and ending, of course, with the four stars being paired off to everyone's satisfaction. In the supporting cast, Walter Connolly, Charley Grapewin, Cora Witherspoon, Lauri Beatty and Charles Trowbridge score heavily. Photography is tops and the gowns and sets alone are worth the price of admission. In short, you can't go wrong on this one.

Catchy tunes and lots of laughs are what to expect from "Pigskin Parade." Jack Haley, Arline Judge and Johnny Downs are featured.

"Pigskin Parade" is a football picture with music. Or, if you prefer—considering the quantity of song and dance numbers—it's a musical picture with football. Burlesquing the big-time tactics of modern college football, "Pigskin Parade" gets under way when an unheard-of college in Texas is invited by mistake to play Yale. Coach Jack Haley and his wife (Patsy Kelly), scour the plains looking for talent and discover a hill-billy from Arkansas (Stuart Erwin), who can toss a melon fifty yards and name his target. They put shoes on him and hustle him right down to good old Texas State, where he becomes the passing sensation of the country. Comes the great game with Yale, and with the going tough in the last few minutes of play our hero whips off his shoes and wins the game for his alma mater. Highest point in the musical department are the songs by the Yacht Club Boys. Best of their numbers is "We'd Rather be in College." "Woo Woo" and "Down With Everything" are close seconds. Judy Garland does well with "It's Love I'm After" in spite of a tendency toward over-emphasis. Tony Martin and Dixie Dunbar click with "You're Slightly Terrific." In the supporting cast are Betty Grable, Johnny Downs, Arline Judge and Fred Kohler, Jr. It's a better-than-average musical of its kind.

Here's a sample of what goes on in "The Big Broadcast of 1937." That's Gracie Allen "amusing" Jack Benny and George Burns.

★★★ The Gay Desperado

(Pickford-Lasky)

Here is an excellent picture, with certain appeal for every audience. It abounds in adventure, humor, romance, satire, outstanding musical numbers and beautiful photography. The well selected cast is headed by Nino Martini, who shows sincere dramatic ability in the role of the unwilling bandit who is taken into Mexico's wildest and gayest band of outlaws because the leader, Leo Carrillo, has a passion for music and thinks Martini does pretty well as a singer. When Ida Lupino and James Blakeley, a clerk and a millionaire's son who have come to Mexico for an elopement, are kidnapped by Carrillo's bandits, the fun begins. Martini falls madly in love with Ida Lupino and she with him, and, fortunately, James Blakeley quite forgets Ida in his hurry to get out of the bandit's lair. Complications come thick and fast when Martini bravely risks his life to get them both smuggled out to safety. And through this all runs the hilarious comedy of Carrillo and his bad hombres, chiefly Harold Huber, as his assistant, and Mischa Auer, a bandit of the old school who looks with scorn on anything smacking of American gangster tactics. Martini sings several songs superbly. Rouben Mamoulian's direction has not missed a trick in bringing out every point which makes for sure-fire entertainment.

★★★ The Big Broadcast of 1937

(Paramount)

This year's production of "The Big Broadcast" is decidedly superior to that of last year. It is fun from start to finish with Jack Benny, Gracie Allen, Bob Burns and Martha Raye contributing outstanding comedy. The romantic interest, furnished by Shirley Ross and Ray Milland, takes second place but is competently handled. Shirley Ross is easy on both the eyes and the ears, while Ray Milland is a young man of engaging personality and obvious ability. The story is laid in a broadcasting station of which Jack Benny is station manager and Martha Raye is his secretary. Bob Burns plays a naïve country lad who is trying to get ahead in the big city, while Gracie Allen comes to the broadcasting station to help the golf cause along and manages to get everybody as mixed up as herself. The outstanding feature of this film is the music of Leopold Stokowski's orchestra whose presentation of a symphony will undoubtedly have the studio deluged with requests for more of this kind of entertainment in pictures of the future.

★★★ Ladies In Love

(20th Century-Fox)

The ladies in the case are Janet Gaynor, Loretta Young, Constance Bennett and Simone Simon—a collection that is worth the price of admission any day. But in an effort to do full justice to such a line-up of important actresses the picture has been weakened, and that in spite of excellent performances from all four. The plot concerns their various heart interests which necessitates a series of jumps from one to another of the girls' engrossing affairs, detracting from the emotional appeal of each. The ruse of having the Misses Loretta Young, Janet Gaynor and Constance Bennett living together in one apartment helps to tie the episodes together and Simone Simon gets into the story by walking off with Paul Lukas, Constance Bennett's main interest in life. Loretta Young plays the wide-eyed young thing who still thinks that honesty is the best policy, especially in love. Constance Bennett takes the opposite stand and they both fade out with broken hearts. Janet Gaynor and Simone Simon are the girls who get their men, though Janet has her woes wondering whether Alan Mowbray, a successful magician, or Don Ameche, an unsuccessful physician, is the best bet. Alan Mowbray provides most of the comedy and a couple of his scenes surpass anything he has done on the screen. Paul Lukas and Tyrone Power, Jr., are competent in lesser roles.

★★★ The Charge of the Light Brigade (Warner Bros.)

"Charge of the Light Brigade" is definitely one of the season's better motion pictures. Its action travels at a terrific pace to an awe-inspiring climax in the historic charge; its photography is both beautiful and startling, while the expert direction of Michael Curtiz maintains an almost breath-taking speed throughout its unreeling. The story, which, as a subtitle explains, is not historically correct, has to do with England's difficulties with her colonies in northern India. When the forces of the Surat Kahn descend upon a practically defenseless military post and massacre the families of the 27th Lancers, the regiment dedicates itself to revenge. Later, transferred to Crimea, they learn that their enemy is also there, aiding the Russians. Under Major Geoffrey Vickers (Errol Flynn) the "brave 600" ride into the Valley of Death in one of the most exciting and thrilling scenes the screen has ever presented. Of the cast, Errol Flynn is outstanding as the young Major. Also excellent are Olivia de Haviland as his fiancée, and Patric Knowles, who shows considerable promise in his American screen debut. In the supporting cast are Henry Stephenson, Nigel Bruce, Donald Crisp, David Niven, C. Henry Gordon, Robert Barrat, Spring Byington, E. E. Clive and J. Carroll Naish.

★★★ We Who Are About to Die (RKO-Radio)

A deeply engrossing picture has been made here, based on David Lamson's book by the same title. The plot is secondary in interest to the study of men's reactions in the death cells of a great penitentiary. Evidence of great care taken in casting this picture is shown, particularly in the types selected to portray the men who are about to die on the gallows. As a psychological study, it has not been surpassed on the screen. The plot of the picture has been constructed to lead up nicely to those sequences, dealing with a "frame" by a gang of crooks on John Beal, who is suspected of stealing the pay-roll of an airplane firm, murdering the man in charge and killing a child while making his escape. The injustice of circumstantial evidence and greedy, unscrupulous politicians is forcefully brought out in the following course of events. John Beal is entirely convincing in his role of an innocent man caught in the web of ruthless crooks and indifferent police protection. Preston Foster, as the criminal detective, gives a sincere performance. Ann Dvorak, as the girl who had planned to marry the convicted man, furnishes the slight romantic interest satisfactorily enough.

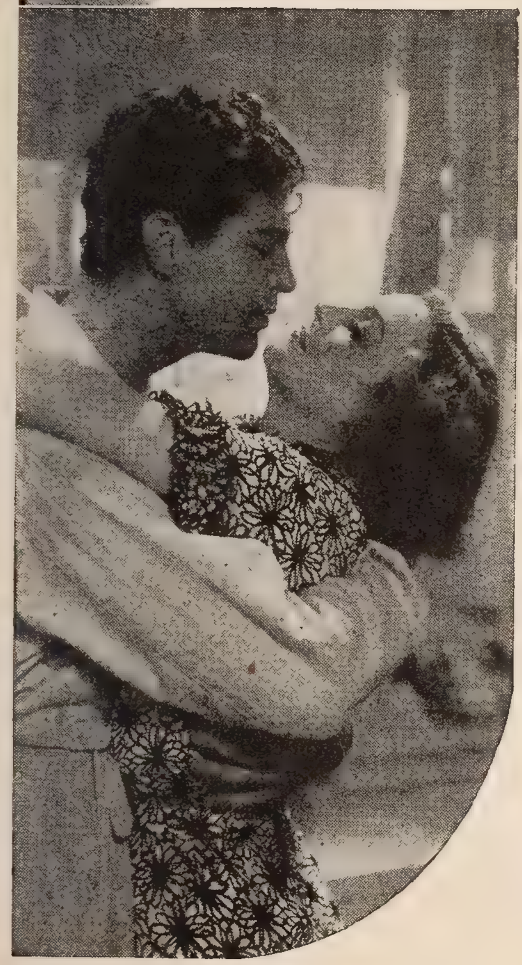
Below, Two newcomers whom you'll be seeing lots of in future pictures — Michael Whalen and Doris Nolan. Here they are in a love scene from "The Man I Marry."



★★ Love Letters of a Star

(Universal)

Here is a competent, though for the most part unfamiliar, cast and a good story that carries your interest through to the final reel. The final reel, as in the case of most mystery tales, is quite a letdown. The love letters belong to Ralph Forbes, an egotistical actor, and have been written by Mary Alice Rice, during a school-girl infatuation for him. Blackmail sets in, followed by Mary Alice's suicide. So her family—consisting of husband, Henry Hunter, sister, Lydia Todd, father and mother—gets together in order to outwit the blackmailer. A series of murders follow, with all the once happy family suspecting each other of dirty work. C. Henry Gordon, as Lieutenant Valcour of the police force, finally gets everything cleared up. Okay for mystery story addicts. (Continued on page 93)

Myrna Loy

Nora and Nick are back! In other words, Myrna and Bill Powell bring you a return engagement of that slick husband and wife team in "After the Thin Man." Incidentally, Myrna admits Nora is her favorite wife— and Myrna's ours!

Charles Boyer

With a future picture date with Garbo on his schedule, Monsieur Boyer is now embroiled with that sprightly American, Jean Arthur, in the provocatively titled "History is Made at Night."

Jean Harlow

You wouldn't think that the above radiant creature would be emoting in an opus called "The Foundry," but Jean's all for realistic drama these days. Spencer Tracy is the chap the plot calls for.

Don Ameche

It was no small feat to make such a hit as Don Ameche did in a character part, but "Ramona" put him on the "rave" list. You'll see Don very soon in "One in a Million."

Cecil B. DeMille brings you Gary and Jean in their grandest picture . . . the story of Wild Bill Hickok and Calamity Jane, the hardest boiled pair of lovers who ever rode the plains . . . a glorious romance set against the whole flaming pageant of the Old West . . .

"Save your fire 'till they come close, then blast the varmints. There's got to be room for white men on these plains."

"Do your worst. We'll still be laughing at a great chief so small he'd kill two helpless persons for spite."

"Gentlemen, my name is Wild Bill Hickok and I think we can settle everything very . . . very peacefully."

"I'LL NEVER DANCE WITH ASTAIRE!"

..says Eleanor Powell

By Charles Darnton

Since Ginger Rogers is turning to dramatic roles, Eleanor Powell seems the logical dancing partner for Astaire. But this is out of the question. Here is Eleanor as she appears in "Born to Dance."

YOU'D NEVER guess it, but the light fantastic is heavy work. That is, you wouldn't know unless Eleanor Powell let you see her feet as God—and dancing—made them. Of all the interviews! Off came a sandal, then a sock, revealing a big toe in mourning. Then another strip act disclosing her other foot in something like a padded cell.

But the fast-moving Queen of Taps laughed it off with: "Funny thing!" She talked in exclamations, her tongue as fast as her feet. "On my trip to the Coast last fall, when the train stopped at Albuquerque, there was a crowd on the platform calling my name. I stuck my head out of the car window. But they yelled, 'We want to see your feet!'"

"So I just put my feet up and did a tap on the window-frame."

Knowing that her strenuous work last winter on the New York stage had put her flat on her back, I wondered how she was feeling.

"Fine! And I now weigh a hundred and twenty-five pounds, the most I've ever weighed. But when I was in 'At Home Abroad' I went from one hundred and twenty-two to one hundred and twelve in five months. Then I was out for three months. I used to lie there up in Westchester feeling my dancing days were over. I didn't know what the trouble was till the doctor told me I had a heart murmur. It sounded more like a shout on my last night at the Winter Garden. And all the time the audience appeared to be rising and falling like a huge wave. I got to the wings just in time to keel over. I'm not the fainting kind, but I did more than my share of it then. That's what stopped me. It was said I left the show because of a three-star row. That wasn't it. They carted me off. For once, dancing 'got' me."

Does this mean a feud between the King and Queen of Taps?

HAPPILY, there was now no sign of it. She was, to be sure, slender as a reed, but possessed of a vitality as inexhaustible as her charm. The only change I noticed was in the color of her hair, from chestnut to blonde—done, she explained, for high-lighting. As for high-stepping, she evidently intended to take it easier.

"I'll do only two pictures a year for six years, then I'll be thirty and not feel a day older than I do now," she assured me. "I'd been going it too hard. After finishing 'Broadway Melody of 1936' I was all in, but I went right from the train in New York to an eighteen-hour rehearsal. That was the beginning of my sudden breakdown. I would never have been able to stand even the picture work if it hadn't been for my six years of ballet training. For days I had bleeding feet. Every time we rested, the Albertina Rasch girls would put their bare feet into tubs of cold water to take down the swelling. But I didn't dare take off my shoes for fear I would not be able to get them on again. When it was all over, I cried for two hours.

All her screen joyousness, then, must have been put on with her make-up.

"Oh, no!" protested Eleanor. "I enjoy dancing. But, like everything else, it must be done in moderation. This is what every girl who goes in for it professionally should remember. It isn't as easy as it looks. But I thought it was when I started."

"How did you start?"

WITH A knife and fork," was her astonishing answer. "Drumming on the table with them," and her nimble fingers did a tap. "I used to drive my mother almost crazy. I suppose it was the rhythm in me. But I never thought of being a dancer till Gus Edwards offered me a job in Atlantic City for seven dollars a night—big stuff. Up to that time all we had was twelve dollars a week, which my mother earned as a waitress there. Then I took lessons in New York, but I had only ten in tap dancing."

Ten lessons, and today at the top! One day she might join that other top-notcher, Fred Astaire.

"Lots of fans have written to ask if we were going to be teamed," said Eleanor, "and no doubt the same question has been put to Astaire. He is, of course, the greatest dancer of them all. But I don't think we would be a good team. Our style of dancing is totally different. Fred is very aerial and covers a lot of space, while I dance close to the ground. I don't doubt he could do both, if only because of his ballet training. And he might like me to do machine gun taps—if he liked me at all. But there is a wide difference between us.

"Then, too, a girl is more fortunate as a tap dancer in pictures for the reason that they take close-ups of her face. They don't do that with a man, so he has to do everything with his feet. Half my work is done with my face. I don't know whether Astaire would like that if we happened to be teamed. Anyway, he doesn't know me at all. Bert Lahr introduced us one night in New York four years ago when I was doing a tap in front of the curtain during the run of 'Hot-Cha,' but he probably doesn't remember me. I'm dying to meet him now, not in the Brown Derby, but in a rehearsal hall. I have a funny idea that if we did meet that way we'd get along swell, because we're both nuts about dancing.

"If he only said, 'I think (Continued on page 72)

She hates night clubs, which is one reason why she has no steady boy friend, Miss Powell claims.

Since he won't be teamed with Eleanor, who will be Astaire's co-star after "Stepping Toes"?

Anyway, the lady has reasons for her startling statement

"Life

By Eleanor Packer

Yes, Clark Gable actually believes this and gives his reasons for saying so

WHEN I'M forty and my work in motion pictures is finished, what will be left for me in life?" Clark Gable asked that question and his gray eyes were dark with an honest worry and bewilderment.

Only in Hollywood could a young, successful man in his middle thirties ask that question. Only there could he face the problem which Clark must solve when he reaches the forty milestone. In all other places and in all other businesses the average man of forty is just beginning to taste his real success. But, for Clark, that birthday means the end, or the beginning of the end, of his professional life.

"I don't like to think of that time. It frightens me," Clark said. "So far as I can see now, there will be nothing left for me in this life. I'll have to find new interests, an entirely new scheme of living. I won't have my work. And I'm sure that I don't want to stop working when I'm still fairly young. But I'm afraid that I'll be too old to begin at the bottom in some new field.

PEOPLE SAY that 'life begins at forty.' They tell us that the years before that age are merely a preparation, that our forties are the golden years when we will have adjusted all our values of living and can honestly enjoy life. That's probably true in the life of the average business man. During his forties he eats the financial fruits of the work he has done during his twenties and thirties, while he goes on building toward more mature successes.

"But it won't be that way with me. My career will be ended. There will be no place to go in pictures, except down the ladder. And I don't want to do that. I hope that I'll have the sense to leave Hollywood and the screen while I'm at least fairly successful. And, if I do that, the life I know today

I looked at Clark, and his words seemed almost fantastic. He looked so young and vital, slouching comfortably in the low red leather chair in his panelled dressing-room on the "Love on the Run" set. It seemed ridiculous for him to talk about his life's ending at forty, or at any other definite time.

Then, suddenly, I thought of the truly tragic figures of Hollywood, the one-time stars, men and women still young in years but veterans in experience, who are walking the streets, alone and forgotten, pathetically hunting for work, any kind of work, in the studios. In one of Clark's own pictures, "San Francisco," there were a half dozen one-time stars, still young in their forties, but old and finished in fame. Then I understood why Clark shuddered at the thought of staying in Hollywood when the heyday of his stardom is ended.

"The worst of it is that I'll probably never have enough money to enjoy long years of leisure when they're forced upon me," he went on slowly. "The good old days, when the Chaplin and Fairbanks and Lloyd fortunes were founded, are gone forever. Today, after we pay our taxes to the government and our fees to agents and a dozen other expenses necessary to this particular business, there isn't much left to save for the rainy day of the workless years. I live very simply. I don't even own my own home and I do very little entertaining. But, even though I save every possible penny and invest as wisely and safely as I can, I don't see how I'm going to put away enough money during the next few years to take care of myself during that long, after-forty period.

"Understand, I'm not complaining. I thank Heaven every day that I was given my (Continued on page 73)

Long week-ends of hunting, fishing and camping appeal to Clark, and usually his sole companion on these trips is Snooper.

AT LAST I've discovered the secret of Hollywood's carefree, debonair charm. The entire town is "pixilated," gloriously, madly and youthfully "pixilated." There are no grown-ups in the place. All the people are children, who live and laugh and love and weep with an unashamed childish abandon. That enduring youthfulness explains their difference from average people in average worlds.

Hollywood's people work hard at the adult business of being actors and actresses. Then they forget that work and play with a child-like exuberance which keeps them fresh and constantly on their physical and mental toes. Boredom is taboo in the film colony. Even among the older inhabitants there is no sign of the calm lassitude which comes elsewhere with years of living and experience. May Robson is as excited over a party as any youngster of ten. She plays with the canaries, hundreds of them, which live in her sunny patio, as gaily as any child romps with her dolls. May is a great-grandmother. She has known more than fifty years of the hard work of the theatrical world, but she has the vital enthusi-

Age means nothing in Hollywood. Old and young, they share the same spirit of perpetual youth. Luise Rainer is one of the town's newer children. Luise is certainly not a child in actual experience. For several years she has been one of Europe's favorite actresses. She has known tragedies, as well as triumphs, but she possesses a naïveté, a healthily vigorous eagerness, which the average high school girl outgrows in her worldly-wise sophomore year.

Luise glories in practical joking. She plays at living with the same emotional intensity which made unforgettable her telephone scene as Anna Held in "The Great Ziegfeld." (Above) It's a dreamy moment for talk of love which Brian Aherne and Merle Oberon steal under the stress of "Beloved Enemy." All the dreams for their futures are caught in this tender moment as they lean close to each other in the moonlight. Although Merle's off-screen heart, David Niven, is in the same picture, he has to watch Brian making love to her. And how would all you young romantics be able to take that —even if the plot did demand it?

Immortal lovers were Camille and Armand and their tragic story never has become stale by repetition. Now it springs to a new life with the exciting combination of Garbo and Robert Taylor to bring it to the screen in "Camille." Here in this breathtaking glimpse you see the adoration of these two who loved so deeply but were forced to watch their love slip away. Garbo is a thrilling Camille, for who can portray more poignantly a woman who loves and loses? Of course, you Taylor fans will proclaim Bob the perfect Armand.

Spooning in the Spotlight

These romantic players give you thrilling lessons in love

There's nothing like a doctor's spotless surgical uniform to make a gal's heart go pit-a-pat violently. In "Once a Doctor," Jean Muir finds Donald Woods the perfect object of her affections. And here, she seems to place a restraining finger against his lips, lest he tell more of those sweet nothings which she couldn't bear his not saying! Jean looks more vibrant and alluring than she has in a long while and her darker, bobbed hair is very flattering. Donald is a reason why girls prefer doctors.

Puppy love wasn't originated in this modern generation. Quite to the contrary, it made life exciting for the teen age of centuries ago. To prove it, here are Virginia Fields and Tyrone Power, Jr. putting their hearts into a glance at one another during a scene from "Lloyds of London." It's not hard to see what Tyrone finds fascinating beneath that frilly, old-fashioned cap Virginia is wearing. And it would be difficult to find a lad who looks more romantic in costume than Tyrone.

Bob and Mrs. Young on their return from England recently.

And Bob Young doesn't mean he's musical when he says—

He Plays in B-Flats

By Martha Kerr

Bob Young is now making "Stowaway" with Shirley Temple and Alice Faye.

LESS THAN two years ago the entire motion picture colony became very alphabet conscious. And about the same time, Robert Young, among others, began to feel very blue and discouraged.

Not that he couldn't learn the alphabet. I'm sure he could, for I know personally a half dozen actors who aren't as bright as Bob, who can rattle off the alphabet with scarcely any difficulty.

Neither was he concerned over letters like NRA or PWA. No, the letters that caused so much concern were just A and B.

The reason these two letters suddenly assumed such importance is that pictures began to be classified as "A" and "B" pictures. That started a mad scramble on the part of the actors to get themselves into "A" pictures, which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars and were made, generally, with more care, with better stories, casts and directors than the others and were supposed to be the best pictures.

"B" pictures, on the other hand, are made because exhibitors insist on running double bills. However, a "B" picture often turns out to be a much greater success financially, as well as providing more entertainment, than any "A" picture. Like, for instance, "The Thin Man," which was whipped up as a little "B" number because Myrna Loy and William Powell weren't working and idle actors are expensive. As you know, it turned out to be a sensation.

Up to this time Bob Young was always the "big brother" type—the fellow a girl could trust. And nothing will get a chap nowhere faster—on or off the screen—than to be a fellow a girl can trust. And so Bob was a consistent "B" picture player. It just seemed that a "B" picture couldn't be made down Metro way, where he is under contract, without Bob in it. And when other producers asked to borrow a handsome leading man, Bob was always brought out, dusted off and "sold down the river."

Bob never complained. No matter what role was handed him, he plugged along, turning out the best performance he could in every picture. Suddenly he found himself playing opposite Claudette Colbert, Katharine Hepburn, Janet Gaynor and Ann Sothern and it was noticed that he was developing into a grand light comedy actor. Remember him in "The Bride Walked Out" with Barbara Stanwyck and "The Bride Comes Home" with Claudette Colbert? He rollicked through these pictures and it is a toss up whether he or his audiences enjoyed his performance more, but he proved that he had a grand sense of humor. It seems that what the industry needed was an actor with a sense of humor and, being equipped with the other necessary tools, such as plenty of good looks and an ability to act, Bob has been in demand by every company since then—for "A" pictures.

And always, after being loaned

Hit Hollywood Early

By George Benjamin

Marian knows whereof she speaks in advising you when to plan your screen career. She was playing in pictures at fourteen and she's only twenty-two now. She's in "Come Closer, Folks" with James Dunn.

Marian Marsh's ideas on how to get ahead in the movies are certainly original

IF YOU want to be a movie actress, get to Hollywood as young as you can!

"Don't let anyone discourage you. I have heard all of those dire warnings. Yes, all the tales about how your life will be messed up and how you'll become disillusioned and hard-boiled—if you attempt to go into pictures. What I've actually found out, for myself, is: they're not so!

"Choose a screen career and you'll have a far more wonderful time than you likely will have otherwise. Begin in your early 'teens, in Hollywood, if it's possible. Don't bother with college—if you wish to act."

This bombshell comes straight from the lips of Marian Marsh. It requires a great deal of courage to speak what you feel is the truth when you're distinctly in the minority. Almost everyone has handed out the same "sane" advice. You will be better off if you banish any longings for Hollywood glory—the competition's too keen, the pace too severe. If you will persist in being ambitious, don't come to California until you are completely prepared. Stay where you are and finish your education, then go on to college and excel in dramatics there. You must have money; you have to be thoroughly trained before you dare venture towards the city of cameras.

That's the regular line. So you can see at a glance that this unusual counsel of Marian's is liable to cause a commotion among the august "authorities."

Admittedly, this is only a twenty-two-year-old talking.

Nevertheless, she has a very good right to add her honest opinions to an ever pertinent topic. She is a success in films. And more, Marian can back up her unorthodox statements by simply remembering her own yesterdays. Amazingly, she herself started absolutely from scratch and she's been a grown-up heroine for seven years!

At fourteen, mind you, she was working in the movies. Two seasons later she was playing opposite the biggest male stars. She didn't debut Cinderella-fashion, as you may have thought, though. There was a lot of publicity once, giving the impression that hers was sudden luck.

"Ambition even pops up when you've not had any burning desire," Marian declared. She and I sat, quite formally, in the living room of her home in Beverly Hills, the house resulting from her spunk. It's a comfortable place, looking down over the busy streets, obviously lived-in by happy, earnest people. I'm fairly well acquainted with Marian and her family—she has a sister and two handsome brothers a couple of years her senior, and a most understanding and wise mother. Brother Tony and I ceased discussing the relative merits of various beaches when his sister arrived for this revealing conversation.

"I WASN'T old enough to be sure what I wanted to do when I first entered the studios," Marian continued. "I just had to have an income; ambition followed when I discovered the future I might attain."

The Marsh clan moved West, jubilantly. The children were delighted to be in a land where sports are never curtailed by New England blizzards. The father, a chocolate manufacturer, had been appointed vice-president of a chain of grocery stores. Then tragedy struck; he died. It was up to each child to do his and her share.

Marian was in the eighth grade at the LeConte Junior High School in Los Angeles. Her sister had secured some work in pictures and so she decided she would try, also. She always has had a quiet sincerity, and it served her well when she applied for jobs as an extra. Outwardly she was sufficiently poised to vow that she was seventeen or eighteen.

She progressed to Hollywood High, and kept on taking time off for $7.50 pay checks (Continued on page 77)

Those sounds in the night up Benedict Canyon way aren't coyotes, as some of the Canyonites suspected; they're Clark Gable. It seems Mr. G. is fond of vocalizing, and his apartment at the Beverly-Wilshire can't hold the Gable voice. So he spends several evenings a week at the home of Director Walter Lang, along with Carole Lombard and Madeline Fields. The quartette's current favorite is "The Daring Young Man," and when the Gable baritone resounds against the hills strong men go into hiding and little children run to their mothers. A poll taken among the neighbors reveals these startling facts: That Gable is a nice guy—47. That Gable can sing—0.

Razzing the bitter end of double feature bills is the latest pastime of movie audiences in Hollywood. It all started with "Second Wife," when people suddenly started hissing the villain and cheering the hero. This sort of thing will either put a stop to double features or audiences will start yelling for more bad pictures so they can have some fun. Sample dialogue for 1937: "How'd you like 'Passion's Playing'?" "Swell! One of the worst pictures of the year."

For a whole week Ginger Rogers steered clear of looking-glasses. She was afraid of scaring herself to death after her titian hair was brunetted for "Mother Carey's Chickens." One morning she appeared at the studio looking happy again. "I like it," she told the director. "In fact I think I'll just stay brunette now that I've looked at myself in a mirror." The director looked far from happy and finally came out with the reason. The studio had changed its mind about Ginger's next picture and Ginger would have to change her mind about her hair. They had decided to put her in another Fred Astaire celluloider, "Stepping Toes," and Fred prefers blondes.

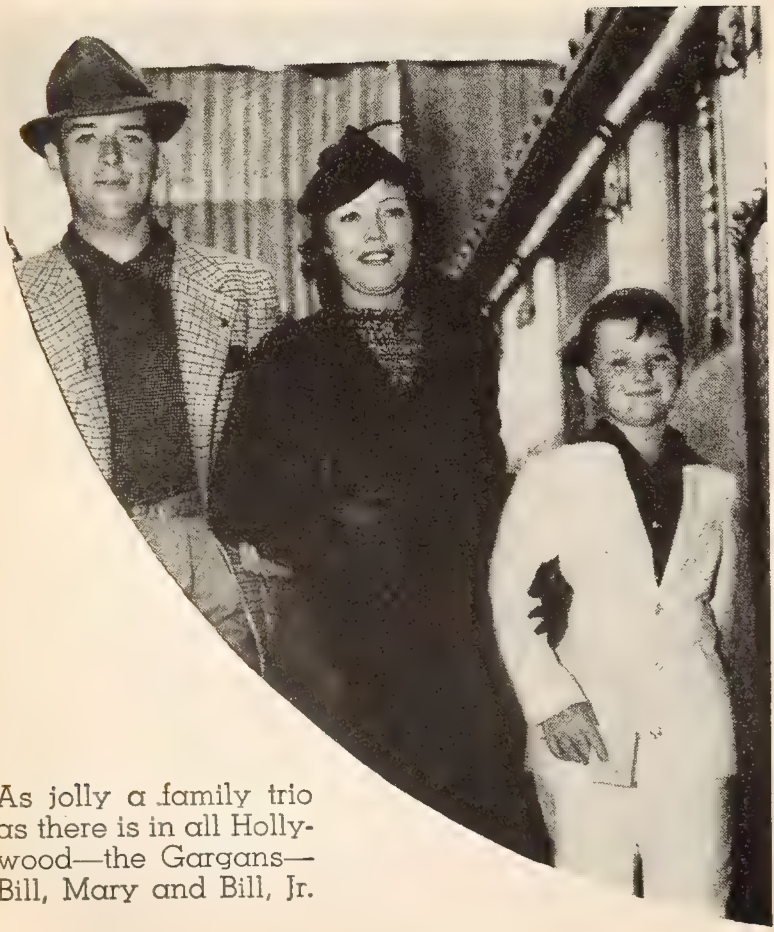
The Hollywood lowdown



As jolly a family trio as there is in all Hollywood—the Gargans—Bill, Mary and Bill, Jr.

Another blonde who has her troubles is Shirley Temple. She appeared at a preview of one of her pictures the other evening without a curl showing under her beret. There was a great buzzing among the fans gathered at the door. Had Temple gone platinum or red-head? But Shirley hadn't even gone brunette—she was just saving her curls from souvenir seekers.

Bob Taylor is a fancier of high-powered automobiles. When Metro gave him his first raise he rushed out and bought a low-slung speedster which startled the Hollywood natives and gave Mr. T. no end of pleasure. His latest purchase, however, has everyone in town fooled. It's a 15-year-old Model T coupe with more rattles than the quints. But underneath the ancient hood is a supercharged motor good for 115 miles an hour. So it's now the pleasure of the country's Number One Box-office smash to go out on the highways and byways making owners of high-priced cars wonder if they're seeing things.

Connie Bennett's interest in producer Joe Schenck may have been purely academic, or strictly business, but it took Miss B. considerable time to convince Gilbert Roland that such was the case. Mr. Roland should know, for he and the same Joe Schenck carried on a bit of rivalry back in the days of Norma Talmadge.

Here's how movie stars are born: When B. P. Schulberg made a transcontinental flight a few months ago, two women passengers called his attention to one of the pilots. He was so handsome in his uniform, said the gals. Mr. S. offered him a screen test and he took it and passed. So now pilot LaVerne Brown, picked out of the air by Mr. Schulberg, has a new contract and a new name. It's John Trent, and he's hoping he stays grounded for some time.

Harold Lloyd has just put in his application for a block of seats at the Olympic games in Tokyo in 1940. That's Harold for you, always waiting till the last minute. He'll probably invite some friends and get an answer something like this: "Awfully sorry, I'm all tied up for 1940. If you had only called last year!"

Saw Katherine DeMille the other day in Beverly Hills wearing a sweat shirt and padded football trousers and carrying a tennis racket. And it wasn't because she had bet on What's-his-name, either. It seems that playing tennis in football garb takes off pounds and pounds in the places a girl feels she doesn't need them.

Alison Skipworth couldn't keep that record of being Hollywood's most complacent actress forever. She broke it the other day on the "White Hunter" set after her first look at the stand-in selected for her. A blood-curdling scream escaped the usually composed Miss Skipworth. "I'm not that fat," she cried wildly. "I've never been that fat!" It took the combined efforts of Director Cummings, Warner Baxter, June Lang, the stand-in and a pair of scales to placate her. Alison weighed in forty pounds lighter.

Isabel Jewell kept the safety valve on her temperament for three days of exceptional stress. During that time, for scenes in "Career Woman," Isabel was drowned a few times, whipped brutally and generally thrown around in accord with the script. At the end of the third day the director acknowledged all the sequences were okay. "You're sure everything's okay?" inquired Isabel politely. At the director's nod of assent, Isabel let out a whoop that shook the stage, tore her water-soaked dress in shreds and jumped up and down on it. "It's all right," she gasped to the astonished cast and crew. "I've just been dying for three days to go temperamental. And it feels swell!"

In their new home, Ann Sothern Pryor was explaining the duties to the butler whom she had just hired. Having read widely on home management for the last couple of months, Ann made an effort to impress him from the beginning with what she required. "And, Parkins," she wound up earnestly, "above all we must have dignity." The butler seemed impressed. "You have very good ideas, Mrs. Pryor," he said, "but you don't want a butler. You want Arthur Treacher."

It happened on the "Camille" set. A girl, who had done a bit in "The Painted Veil" with Garbo, was assigned a small part in the Swedish siren's new opus. Recalling Garbo's kindness to her in the former assignment, the gal rushed up to thank her and express her pleasure at working in "Camille." But Garbo cut her short with, "I do not know you. Go away." Maybe she really does want to be alone.

Sonja Henie had been proving for several weeks that the Norwegians can take it. Working on her first picture were Adolphe Menjou, the Ritz Brothers, Ned Sparks and other famous gagsters who devoted themselves to initiating Sonja into some Hollywood practical jokes. One day the skating star excitedly called the cast and director to a corner of the rink. "Look!" she cried in alarm, pointing to long, white worms in the ice, "Ice worms! They'll ruin the rink and cost the studio thousands!" What could they do, asked the assembled crowd. Sonja explained that ice worms work only in the dark, so for the entire day the director had a couple of electricians training lights on the infected ice areas. When two more were hired to keep the lights going all night, Sonja admitted putting strips of excelsior in the water before it was frozen to give the cast the worm scare.

Tyrone Power, Jr. was so infatuated with Sonja that he took to skates. Now he's looking for a girl who's idea of a good time is a movie and a loge seat.

If Mr. G. Brent has been reading his papers lately, he must have snapped his fingers several times, saying, "Aw, shucks!" There was, for instance, that item about the mysterious loads of orchids sent to Miss Garbo—mysterious in that the M-G-M publicity department (the old smarties) immediately suspected Robert (Armand) Taylor and Bob, it is rumored, suspected the publicity department. Mr. Brent, as you recall, was supposed to have done a pretty good courting job of the Swedish "Camille" about a year ago. But did he send orchids by the van load? No! It must make him kinda mad, now, thinking back over the extra publicity lineage a nice gesture like that would have brought him. Of course, he doesn't care much this year, but a chap has got to watch his billing, even in romantic matters, especially with Bob getting so much news space all the time.

As for Miss Garbo, about whose beautiful head always swirls a press-made dither, she has gone right ahead with her plans to take a nice recuperative two months cruise before her next picture, "Beloved." The fact that Charles Boyer is her next leading man and that he is happily married, has sent the press departments into a long silence while they think up something to hurdle that one (romantically speaking). How about dusting off Reuben Mamoulian again, huh?

The Eddy-MacDonald "Maytime" opus certainly had script pains before it actually got under way. The early sequences were completely scrapped and the period of the picture revised. Not only that, but house cleaning seemed to be in order all around with the original director and many of the supporting cast being replaced. As far as you fans are concerned though, the major part of "Maytime" was kept intact; that is, the unbeatable duo of Jeanette and Nelson. Probably what you will see after all this re-arranging, will be something as swell or sweller than "Naughty Marietta" and "Rose Marie."

A phrase has been coined by the English courts for all little actresses who fight over the back fence with their studios. They're "naughty girls." Bette Davis, the gal termed naughty, found the jolly old British barristers were a pretty cold mutton proposition when she aired her Warner contract woes over there. Oddly, they seemed to think that Bette wasn't being persecuted by having to work at three g's a week at home. What's more they thought her studio had every right to prevent her from augmenting her pittance abroad, while still spatting with the higher-ups at home. It all ended with Bette coming back—and as we go to press—meekly considering Don Byrne's story "The Changeling" as her homecoming plum.

The hoss opera boys are going to have to look to their stuff. Clark Gable of the top drawer fillums has gone completely "wahoo" and even wants to rope steers. Mr. G. has always been an outdoor fellow, but has confined his activities to fishing and hunting. Harry's girl cattle are planning a stampede for Clark's autograph to replace their ranch brandings!

Fernand Gravet, the new French star under contract to Warners, must have been a little bewildered by his press reception in New York, en route to Hollywood. The little soiree took place in the setting of the "White Horse Inn," one of the current stage hits. The whole stage is on a gigantic scale and represents a Tyrolian village. The reception took on quite an international feeling what with M. Gravet, a Frenchman, speaking excellent English while yodelers and the press peasants disported themselves in typical native fashion. Incidentally, Fernand Gravet is a great Parisian idol and is reputed to be the richest movie actor in the world. On both counts he stands more than an average chance of being quite a social and cinematic wow over here.

The honeymoon, in Hollywood, is over when the bride and groom have to put back on the grease paint. Dick Powell and Joan Blondell returned from their rather studio-guided honeymoon in New York and took a brief rest in the privacy of their own home, before starting back to work. And Irene Hervey, who hasn't made a picture since she married Allan Jones, finally couldn't resist a chance for a meaty part in "Grand Old Woman." As for Ann Sothern and Roger Pryor, they spent their honeymoon working at personal appearances in Chicago—Roger with his orchestra and Ann on the local stages.

Incidentally, the step-children acquired by the fall crop of cinema second marriages is quite interesting. Dick Powell became a step-papa to Joan Blondell's young son. Allan Jones has legally adopted Irene Hervey's little girl. Henry Fonda now has a four-year-old daughter by his marriage to Frances Brokaw. A little child seems to lead them right to the altar these days.

It can't be said that the suspense on the "Gone with the Wind" cast isn't swell publicity. Ever since it was announced that the year's most popular book would be made into a picture, all Hollywood and the public at large have been naming their own casts. One thing is certain, that no matter who is selected to play Scarlett and Rhett Butler, there will be heavy fan controversies. Already, the rumors that Tallulah Bankhead and Ronald Colman might be the leads caused such a to-do that Selznick announced that no decision would be made for some time. So, pick your own leads and fume at the final outcome!

Some fun! Elizabeth Allen and Robert Benchley laugh heartily. One of Bob's own quips?

And right, Irene Hervey with husband, Allan Jones, join the "Romeo and Juliet" attenders.

Only a few seats away from the gal he's been beauing (Arline Judge) sits Tony Martin with Alice Faye. All this at a recent football game.

Bob Taylor must be pretty confident about the outcome of his "friendly squabble" with Metro over a little matter of finances. It probably takes a few more karats to land it on the lady's left, Bob.

While we're speaking of ranches, here's a note about the Paul Kellys. In case you didn't know, Mr. K. always goes down to his corral with a hip pocket full of carrots for his prize colt, "Muchacho." When Clark Gable walked into his dressing-room at the Music Box Theatre, the other day, to play George Washington in a radio version of Maxwell Anderson's "Valley Forge" on a cigarette hour, he found himself wading through miniature cherry trees and tiny hatchets. And on his mirror was a sign proclaiming him to be "The Father of His Country." It all bore the unmistakable touch of Carole Lombard, who is said to be going steady with Mr. Gable. As someone may have said, the original G. Washington may have been the father of his country, but never on a national hook-up.

Brian Aherne looks upon a Hollywood contract as a life sentence, but then—there's that small item of money

By Dorothy Herzog

Mr. A. is a shy fellow who, like many Britishers, treasures freedom above all else. He hates to talk about himself so this is one of the two interviews a year he grants.

Not TOO Mercenary

BRIAN AHERNE, British born, American by inclination, but still British in heart, finds himself face to face with a problem far more difficult than the usual problem of a movie and stage hero. Brian is faced with the problem of: Money or freedom.

"Money," admitted Mr. Aherne candidly, "is a good thing to have. Freedom, too, is good." Whereupon, he took short puffs upon the pipe clamped between his teeth and gazed steadily into the open-fire grate of his New York apartment.

This apartment is Brian's pleasure of freedom, for though tucked just around the corner from one of New York's busiest centers—that of the Grand Central Station—it is neatly isolated from the bedlam of the metropolis. It is a narrow little house that rises three stories and enjoys several rooms on each floor. Brian's drawing-room occupies the second floor. At least, it is his drawing-room so long as he remains. He subleases the place, furniture included. But there are sundry books that belong to him lining the shelves—travel books, novels, plays and a few biographies.

The back of the room—though, paradoxically enough, the front, really—overlooks a rectangular stretch of blooming openness which is shared by a number of other houses of the same height as his. Each house has its own little garden, a few trees, and, of all quaint things in New York, birds that enjoy themselves without danger of gasoline fumes. This bit of cultivated Nature is called by those who share it Turtle's Row. Really, a most charming retreat. And across the way, Mr. Aherne will indicate to you, lives Katharine Hepburn when she is in the city.

"Yes," he repeated, "money is a good thing to have and freedom, too, is good."

Brian Aherne likes the stage, so he prefers to go to Hollywood only for good roles such as is his in "Beloved Enemy" opposite the glamorous Merle Oberon.

WHEREIN IS the crux of this popular player's present quite pleasant predicament. Freedom, to him, is making a picture or two in Hollywood and then returning to New York to do a stage play. (Continued on page 80) fireside to be on your own in the big city. So the new rule is 'Don't give strangers the eye, unless they eye you first.'

"Pick-ups are still looked upon with a raised eyebrow, as they've always been, but picking someone up along the boulevard or in a store is not what I'm talking about. But suppose there's a man working in a far part of your office you sort of have a yen for, but it seems that you don't have any mutual friend to do the honors. You see him every day in the elevator and as he seems to know you're around, I always say, give him a friendly 'Hello' instead of an aloof stare and, who knows what that hello might lead to? Who knows! Or suppose you're waiting in your doctor's or your lawyer's or anyone else's office and, if a man, also waiting, says something original about the weather, is there any reason why you shouldn't join him in the engaging conversation that's sure to follow?

"Of course, you don't have to get chummy and you should think before dashing off to lunch with him. Still that can be done on the up and up if you pick the restaurant. An out-of-the-way hole-in-the-wall or a place with private dining-rooms is certainly not the place. An ordinary restaurant, preferably a busy one in the center of the town, is. And then, unless it's love at first bite, you can each go your separate ways afterward, and there's no need for his seeing you home in a taxi.

"It's so silly for a girl always to be suspicious of men. Entirely too many girls are brought up that way, mistaking even kindly ones for villains twirling their mustaches. I made a mistake like that once. It wasn't long after I had left my cradle that I went to see a famous producer for a job. I had to wait in the outer office and there was an equally famous director, though I didn't know who he was at the time, waiting, too. He asked me a dozen questions that I answered with either 'Yes' or 'No.' I was being just as snooty as I could, because I was sure he was out for no good. He finally gave up.

"I found out afterwards that he had been looking for a blonde for his own repertoire (Continued on page 88)

Janet Gaynor

Simone Simon

Janet Gaynor, an old-timer on the lot, had to think fast to outwit Simone Simon, the newcomer. But all was serene with the "Ladies in Love"—outwardly.

By Walter Hosting

Polite's the Word!

for the armed neutrality which was rife when these four top stars played together

IT WASN'T until Connie Bennett saw the dressing-room they'd thrown together for her for "Ladies in Love," and then discovered Janet Gaynor's decidedly more scrumptious one nearby, that the fun really began! Up to that moment, the spectators really hadn't gotten their money's worth.

Excuse me, please, if now and then in this story, I lapse into the phraseology of prize-fight reporting. I can't help it. You see, the whole set-up on that "Ladies in Love" set the first day on the production was like the atmosphere in Hollywood's famous Legion Stadium on the Friday night of a big championship fight. The crew and the extras and the others, who managed to crowd onto the set, were as keyed up as the ringside mob at the big fight—only this, they knew, was going to be even better. In a prize fight, you see, there are only two battlers trying to outpunch each other. Here they were going to see four of the screen's craftiest stars try to outstar each other—blonde, battling Constance Bennett, red-haired bantam-weight Janet Gaynor, sultry brown-haired Loretta Young, and Simone Simon, the fiery dark-horse from Paree.

And over on the sidelines, the one person for whom everybody felt a bit sorry—referee—er, beg pardon, I mean Director E. H. Griffith. So, as I pleaded before,

Loretta Young

Constance Bennett

Connie Bennett was a free lance player, but she was used to big star stuff and would have it.

Gentle-appearing Loretta Young had too recently been very ill to worry about her best spot in the starry bout.

forgive me if this gets to be a blow-by-blow report, instead of a story of the doings of four ladies-in-love-with-stardom! BUT—don't look for me to award any decision. I'm no fool; as far as I'm concerned, this was a no-decision bout!

I never saw so many workers on one set in my life—somehow, the word had gotten around that this production, with four stars, was going to be dynamite. A record crowd managed to find more or less legitimate reason to be on the stage that first day.

All four combat—er, all four ladies showed up in the pink of condition. Loretta did look a bit drawn; insiders reported she'd been ill. Connie looked calm, but determined. Janet was maxbaerish, with smiles for everybody on the sidelines. Simone ignored the spectators, kept her eyes on the other ladies.

They went under the lights looking for a surprise opening feint. Simone uncovered the first action—taking the other three by complete surprise with a brand-new blondined hair-do! They'd been ready for her normal, neither blonde nor brunette color, but overnight, she'd gone brilliant blonde. It was a direct blow at Connie, the only other blonde in the ring. But Connie recovered quickly with a glance into the mirror on the sidelines, that showed her own blonde crown to be still brilliant.

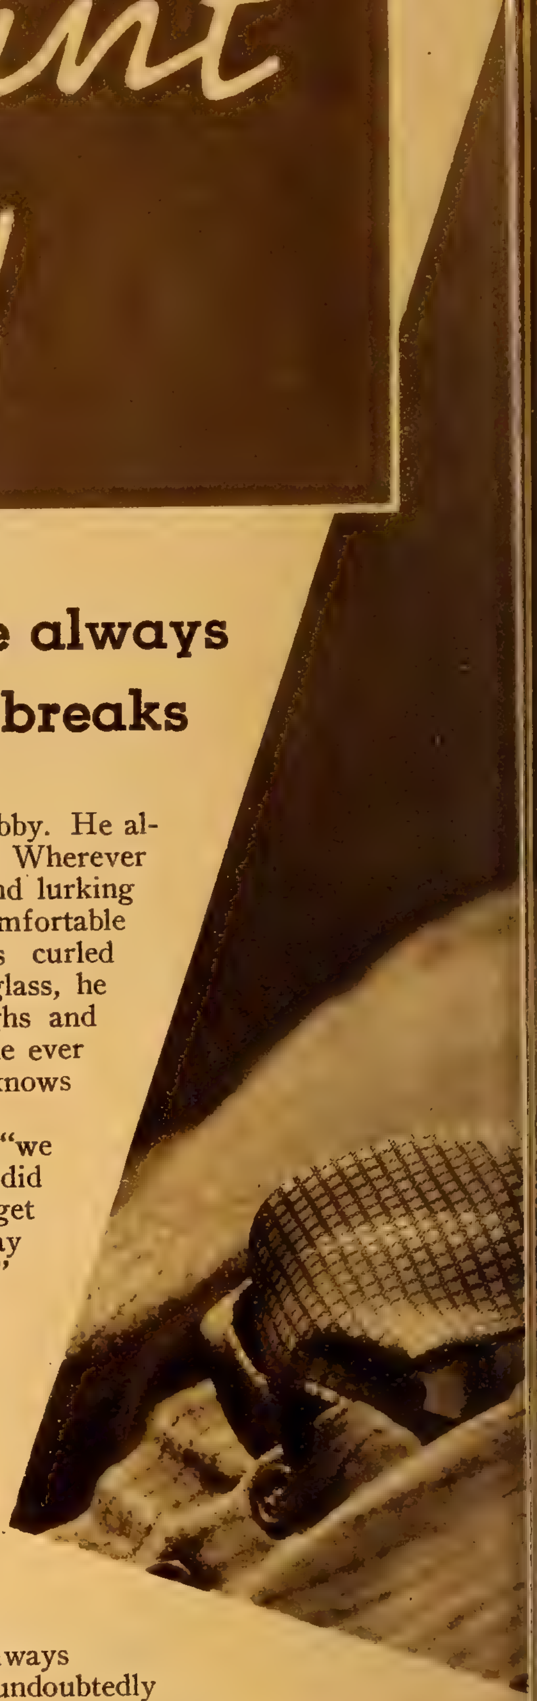
Ringsiders whispered that Simone's revolutionary blondeness was a smart trick by the studio, who's aiming Simone for the Hollywood championship. Simone insisted it was her own idea. But whatever it was, it turned out to be a flop! It revealed that Simone, as a blonde, had lost all the puckish personality which had set the fans to raving in "Girls' Dormitory."

Studio bosses went into a huddle. The first day's rushes were rushed to the incinerator and destroyed. Executive orders went out. When Simone showed up for the next round, her hair was back to its natural color—and they had to re-shoot the entire blonde action. Some spectators insist Connie grinned slyly. She had dodged Simone's feint, and scored the point for herself instead.

Spectators were growing restive. This wasn't real action. They'd come prepared for dynamite and rough-and-tumble, catch-as-catch-can battling. Instead, the first few moments of the affair showed all four ladies actually smiling at each other. Some of the crowd began to leave the stage. Wiser ones stayed; (Continued on page 67)

He Just Can't Help It!

Despite Frank Morgan's vague manner, he always manages to blunder somehow into lucky breaks



FROM 1876 until 1916, Frank Morgan had a cauliflower ear. You can see it for yourself, standing out like a wilted sunflower, in his latest picture, "Maytime."

Of course, Frank Morgan wasn't even born in 1876, but the character he is portraying in "Maytime" was. However, the idea of giving this character a cauliflower ear wasn't the brain baby of the scenario writer. It was entirely original with a mosquito that lit on his ear and sat down, hard, the night before Frank was to make a close-up for his first scene in the picture.

The scenes up to that point had been made and the mechanics of the scene prevented his turning around with his good ear to the camera. So what happened? So this happened. Every morning, after the damage done by the mosquito had disappeared, Mr. Morgan had to sit while the make-up man manufactured a mosquito-bitten ear to match the one he wore in his first scene in the picture.

Mr. Morgan didn't like the idea, for in addition to the ear make-up, he had to age forty years in the picture and the intricacies involved in making him look any age from twenty-five to sixty-five took two hours each morning. Two hours, when he could have been sleeping! If there is one thing Frank Morgan likes a lot, it is to sleep late in the morning, and after five years in Hollywood, his principal objection to motion pictures is that studio routine makes him get up early.

When he is not on call for work, it is practically impossible to find him. And I, who waited weeks for the studio to do just that, should know.

"Well, you see," he explained in his drawling voice, "when I'm not working I play all night and sleep all day. It makes it rather—ah—difficult—." The sentence fades away to end itself in your imagination.

Between pictures he likes to go to Palm Springs with his good friend, Charlie Butterworth.

"We'll go down and relax and play a lot of tennis and take sun baths," he plans. "We'll get a real rest."

Down they go to Palm Springs. They plan to go to bed at a reasonable hour, get up at sunrise for a couple of sets of tennis before breakfast and after breakfast to take a sun bath and a swim. But after dinner Mr. Morgan meets a friend in the lobby. He always meets a friend. Wherever he goes, there is a friend lurking about. And so, in a comfortable chair with his fingers curled amiably around a tall glass, he sits and talks and laughs and has the best time anyone ever had. And before he knows it, it is morning.

"Well," he laughs, "we didn't make it today, did we, Charlie? But let's get a little sleep and I'll play you right after lunch."

When you have an appointment with him, take a good book along, for if he makes his appearance at all, he is sure to be late. His intimates have yet to decide whether he is really absent-minded or if it is an act, but they always wait for him, which undoubtedly encourages the habit.

They fume, they fuss, and they pace the floor.

But always, just as they reach the boiling point and are ready and determined to tear him to bits, he makes his appearance. His timing is uncanny and his approach, well that is something!

He enters the room cautiously, a look of bland innocence but watchful preparedness on his face and, turning on all the charm of which he is capable (which is plenty) he says, "Am I late? I'm so sorry."

He consults his watch. He even holds it to his ear to make sure it is running, all the time looking so embarrassed that his friends by this time are on the verge of apologizing to him. But they (Continued on page 71)

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Morgan (below) are one of the most popular couples in Hollywood. In fact, no party is complete without these two.

Because his dancing sequence with Shirley Temple in "Dimples" was such a riot, Frank Morgan trips the light fantastic again in his next picture.

Handsome

By Mary Marshall

Garbo uses the slickest eye make-up of any star.

Eleanor Powell achieves a look of downright prettiness, though she hasn't a beautiful feature to her name. What's her big secret?

Do you know how to make your make-up make you attractive? Movie stars do is as Make-up does

Katharine Hepburn depends upon make-up to attain an individual, though artificial, appearance.

Irene Dunne retains the original shape of her eyebrows but accents them with a pencil line.

THERE ARE four very distinct types of good looks on these two pages. Maybe you don't belong to any one of these types for, heaven knows, there are dozens more. And then, there are thousands of exceptions to every type rule, too. I haven't the faintest hope of covering in this short article a tenth part of what could be said about make-up. I hope however, to give you some good, plain general advice, a few individual tips, and to tell you about a few stunts which may be new to you. So gather 'round, gals, and let's discuss the topic which, next to clothes and lo-o-o-ve, is dearest to every feminine heart.

First, do you resemble—a lot or a little—Miss Eleanor Powell? Even if you don't, just scan the following paragraphs. You may get a hint.

Eleanor is young, she's fresh-looking, she's wholesome and sweet-looking. And she hasn't one outstandingly beautiful feature to her famous name. Her hair is just plain brown—and naturally straight. Her eyes are okay, but nothing remarkable as to shape, size or adornment of lash and brow. Her nose verges on the snub. Yet the general impression is of youthful prettiness, isn't it? She has a nice skin (hev yuh wrote fer my Skin Routine Number One?) and she has a nice firm chin.

A young girl of this general type should give the illusion of naturalness. She may use every cosmetic on the counter—but a little of everything. This girl can be found by the thousands on our college campuses—and that doesn't mean that she need be lacking in individuality, either. But we know her by that clean, scrubbed look of her skin, by the fact that she appears to be wearing no make-up except lipstick, by a naturalness which has nothing whatsoever to do with dowdiness and which doesn't forget that sex appeal is necessary in this world. And that brings me to a few specific make-up tips for this girl.

1. FOR SCHOOL, for the office, for every day living, use only that make-up which you absolutely require. Lipstick—yes. Bright lipstick, because it's fashionable, even though it ain't natural. Lipstick is the one beauty aid wherein almost every girl out of the sub-deb class may be as gay and mad as she likes. For brownettes generally, a clear, true red is the thing. Names of shades vary with the different brands. Good, bright shades are called, for example, flame, poppy, flamingo, scarlet—or just plain "light." All are good. If your hair is light brown, your eyes brown rather than blue, your skin either pale or olive, choose a lipstick, with a slightly orange cast. If you have naturally rosy cheeks, go easy on the lipstick. Use a medium shade—more rose or pink than red. If your hair has a reddish cast, try to find a lipstick with a rust tone—a brown-red.

Put lipstick on with quick dabs—don't bear down hard and draw a hard line on your mouth. Dab around the outline, then fill in with dabs. Your lips should be dry when you apply lipstick. A touch of cold cream or vaseline, rubbed well into the lips first, is a swell idea now that winter is upon us. See to it that there isn't an ugly dividing line showing when you open your lips. Blend the lipstick a bit toward the inside (Continued on page 81)

Romancing was fun, so Joel didn't want to quit; then—

Love Sneaked In

By Ben Maddox

BEING IN love with love was so swell that Joel McCrea didn't think he'd ever want to stop.

Yet he did abandon his precious freedom, which is one reason why you see his picture with the Missus, the lovely Frances Dee, on this page. When you learn why he quit, you'll not only discover what Joel is like personally, but you will realize what has given his career its new impetus.

Love can do things to men in Hollywood, as well as to the girls who are caught up in the fairy-tale whirl of the movies. Frequently it tangles up men's lives, too.

I know Joel now. I "knew him when"—when he was Hollywood Catch No. 1, the most sought-after male in the entire picture colony. The most discerning hostesses used to start their exclusive guest lists with his name. You saw him beauing Constance Bennett and Gloria Swanson, and other top-notchers. They gazed adoringly up into his laughing blue eyes and were wholly intrigued by his clean-cut youth.

But while he was blithely speeding ahead, taking romance where he found it and getting by professionally on sheer charm, he remembered his parents and his background. When the inquisitive press cornered him for statements on love, he declared that he was positive he wouldn't ask an actress to be his wife.

Joel's father was a prominent executive for a Los Angeles corporation and the McCreas had a delightful house in fashionable Brentwood. His mother presided over their home with the utmost graciousness. There was no sham, nothing of the tawdry in that atmosphere.

He was strongly drawn to glamor, but it was a tinsel bubble to be chased light-heartedly, gayly. The wholesale feminine flattery didn't fool him. Nor did his suddenly big salary. He was already familiar with the niceties of the world, so he wasn't extravagant. He inherited a keen business head as well as a desire for a sane, respectable success. So, although he was the best man at the swankiest Hollywood parties, he was simultaneously salting away a generous share of his earnings, and sidestepping amorous snares.

Now, after three years of matrimony, Joel is the same and yet he's different. He still is tall and broad-shouldered and he continues to sport the finest tan in town. But the love of beautiful Frances Dee has changed him into a genuine actor, and into a mature person. The de luxe beach boy has grown up.

"I was silly when I presumed love would be a liability to me," he admits unreservedly. "It isn't! If I seem to have made any progress, chalk up all the credit to love.

"I fancied myself an adventurer. Instead of hopping off to darkest Africa I was pitting myself against the modern wiles of Hollywood. I had no hope of ever being more than a 'personality,' though.

WHEN I first took Frances out I had no idea at all what she was to mean to me. I was perfectly satisfied to stay single. But love sneaked up on both of us. I married because I was lucky, and because I felt more than merely romantic about Frances. It had seemed dumb to be tied down in Hollywood. I'd never encountered a woman who was more important to me than myself. However, don't marry until you bump into someone who'll pass that infallible test.

"Certainly, I'm glad I finally stopped playing at romance. Pseudo-love is a lark, but the real thing's better!"

You've often heard it proclaimed that marriage is liable to be a tyrant that will jealously stifle individuality. For Joel, the step was considerably more momentous than it is for the average fellow. Most of the invitations that had swamped him abruptly ceased. And, immediately following the news of his turning benedict, his fan mail dropped from three thousand letters a month to three hundred.

"You bet that alarmed me!" Joel, his hair rumpled as though he had just emerged from a game of handball and a shower, went on being honest. "Fan mail is one indication of how well you're doing. But I had no pangs of regret. It was a new problem to be solved. Eventually, the average jumped up again. (Continued on page 74)

New York, London, Paris and, finally, Hollywood have been stepping stones in Beverly Roberts' very young, but exciting career.

Along Came Fate

By Virginia T. Lane

Bette Davis was to have played in "God's Country and the Woman," with George Brent, but her role was finally handed to Beverly.

Beverly Roberts' pre-movie adventures are worthy of an Errol Flynn

THAT MAY not be just a shove-around that Fate is giving you. It may be her way of introducing you to success! Consider, for example, the case of Beverly Roberts.

Many a strange adventure led up to that telephone call which meant stardom for her, after exactly nine months in Hollywood. There was nothing to mark it as a special call. The 'phone went burr-ruptt-BURR the way it always did and Beverly pushed her Washington Cream Pie into the oven and made a dive for it.

"Miss Roberts?" said a pleasant, impersonal voice. "Warner Brothers Studio calling. Be ready to leave at eight tomorrow morning for location up in Washington. We're giving you Bette Davis' part in 'God's Country and the Woman'—"

Bette Davis' part! The part Bette had considered so good she nearly called a halt to her feud with Warner Brothers in order to play it. "It's the only part since 'Of Human Bondage' that I'd give my eye teeth to do," she had said. But she didn't end the feud. And she didn't get the part. Beverly Roberts did—newcomer, half-pint from the Bronx.

She sat there by the 'phone in a glow. Sat there until an acrid awful smoke brought her up sharply. The Washington Cream Pie had become a Washington burnt crisp.

Things just happen to Beverly. It's been that way since she was sixteen. Before that she lived a normal New York school-girl's life with her parents and a brother and a few dreams. Most of the dreams concerned Life and the great things she hoped to do in medical research. (Her family had been active in it for generations. Sir Edward Jenner, discoverer of the vaccine for small-pox, was an ancestor on her mother's side.)

Then along came a friend with news which upset all preconceived plans. Eva Le Gallienne was opening a Civic Repertory Theatre. She would take a limited number of young hopefuls and train them for the stage. "You'd be simply wonderful on the stage, Bev!" said her friend.

A day or so later a plump and rosy girl with honey-colored hair and honey eyes confronted Miss Le Gallienne. "So you can act!" said the lady.

"I don't know. But I'm going to do everything possible to learn how."

Eva liked that. She said, "Come back tomorrow."

That "tomorrow" lengthened into a year of fencing, dancing, vocal exercises, play readings, scene sketching. Then the company closed and, armed with letters of introduction to important producers, Beverly sped over to Broadway. But the depresession had beat her there. By sheer perseverance she wrangled a job in "The Passionate Pilgrim." It lasted four days.

"Girls in Uniform" did a little

On shipboard, Joan danced in this glamorous black net gown trimmed with appliqued discs of deep red velvet on the skirt.

For restaurant dining and cocktail parties, Joan chose this black crepe tunic dress besprinkled with sequins.

by Adelia Bird

EVEN THE scenario writers, whose business it is to think up new plots, could not have conceived a more romantic finale to one of Hollywood's most popular friendships than the engagement and subsequent marriage of Joan Blondell to Dick Powell. For over a year Joan had been beaued by Dick, one of Hollywood's most eligible and cagier bachelors, and all the cinema town, not to mention the countless fans of both, hoped that they would marry.

To anyone with an eye to fashion news, it was interesting to watch the transformation of Joan. When she first separated from her former husband, Joan was too plump and much too careless in her dress. She didn't seem to care a hang whether she looked smart, and certainly she spent no greater thought upon her wardrobe. But—shortly after Mr. P. started ringing her doorbell, Joan took a new interest in herself. It wasn't many weeks before everyone sniffed a new romance, for Joan had lost pounds and had acquired a sudden enthusiasm for clothes. It is no surprise then that, when her engagement was formally announced, Joan went on a perfect trousseau-buying binge. From one who cared practically nothing about clothes, she has become one of Hollywood's most fashion-conscious stars.

Although it was hard to corner Joan for more than a few moments at a time prior to her wedding, I was fortunate enough to get her to pose in a number of the attractive costumes which compose her beautiful trousseau. As you will notice, there is a preponderance of formal and semi-formal costumes, the reason for this being that Dick and Joan planned a honeymoon that required an abundance of evening and dinner clothes. As you know, by now, they were married aboard the S. S. Santa Paula and sailed through the Panama Canal to New York. Joan needed smart evening clothes for the boat, as well as plenty of formal things for the entertaining which was done for them upon their arrival in New York. And it's more than possible, too, that Joan knows she wears evening clothes to perfection!

WITH BOTH Dick and Joan rushed up to the moment of their wedding with pictures to be finished, Joan had to shop hectically and plan her wedding with a minimum of fuss. However, with all the hurry and last-minute excitement, there wasn't a detail of either her trousseau or her wedding costume that was neglected. I had the feeling that Joan was determined that her second marriage was going to have some of the charm and romance that her first one lacked. I don't know whether you recall her first marriage ceremony or not, but it was one of those off-to-Yuma or Phoenix affairs in which Joan tried to avoid publicity by dressing up in a farcical disguise of red wig and ugly dark glasses. Not a very alluring get-up for a bride—and, no doubt, when she thought back upon it, she felt a little cheated of some of the glamor which is a bride's prerogative.

There's no doubt that she caught up on the glamor for her second wedding—she looked perfectly lovely in a dusty rose chiffon gown and a wide-brimmed blue hat faced about the edge of the brim with the same shade of chiffon as her dress. The gown itself was typical of the soft, clinging type of costume Joan likes. The skirt was cut with an uneven hemline in a petal effect, the longer points touching the floor. The bodice had a deep decolletage, softly shirred, and her shoulders were just covered with the chiffon. Her bridal bouquet of orchids and lilies-of-the-valley was tied with blue taffeta to match the color of her hat—all in all, a charming costume for either a second wedding or for anyone who does not want to wear white and a veil.

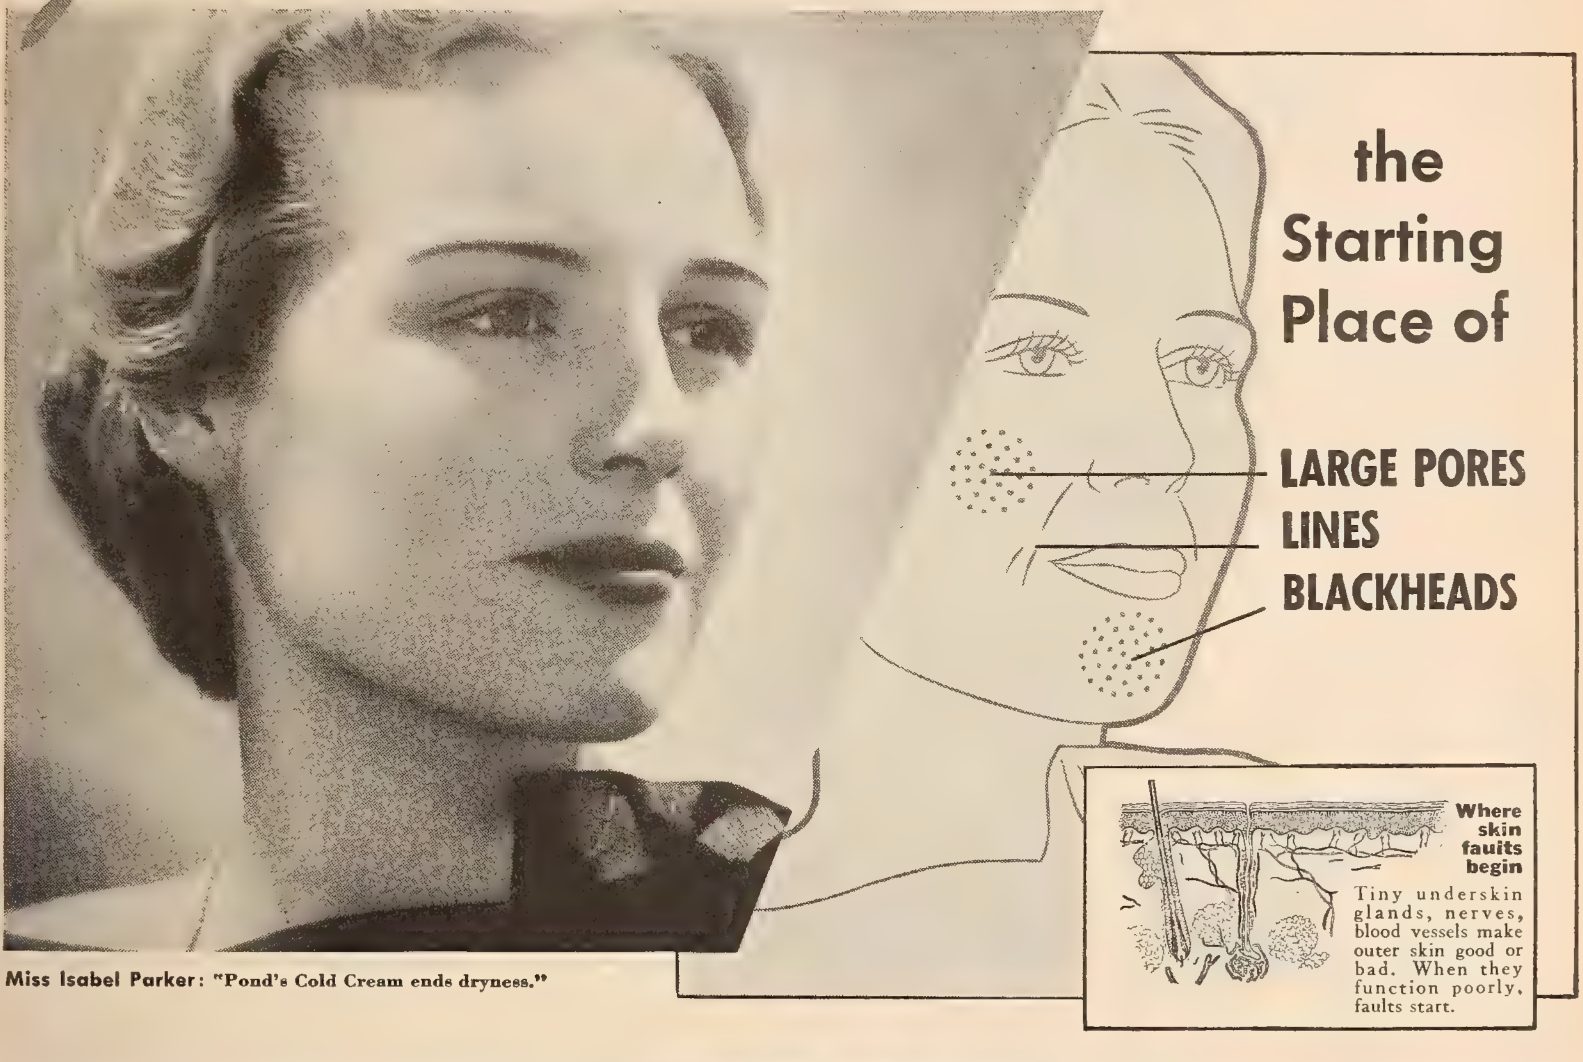
Get at that Faulty Under Skin



the Starting Place of
LINES
BLACKHEADS
Where skin faults begin
Tiny underskin glands, nerves, blood vessels make outer skin good or bad. When they function poorly, faults start.

Miss Isabel Parker: "Pond's Cold Cream ends dryness."

And here's the rousing treatment that keeps it vigorous . . .

HORRID skin faults are usually underskin faults. Blackheads come when tiny oil glands underneath are overworked, give off a thick, clogging oil.

Next thing you know, your pores are looking larger.

Lines around your eyes, mouth are just your outer skin crinkling, because your underskin is getting soft and flabby.

But you can stop those cloggings! Bring fresh life to that faulty underskin—

Twice a day invigorate your underskin with a rousing Pond's deep-skin treatment.

Pond's Cold Cream contains specially processed oils which go way down deep into your pores. Right away it softens dirt . . . Floats it out . . . and with it the clogging matter from the skin itself. You wipe it all off. Right away your skin feels fresher—looks brighter.

Now waken glands . . . cells

Now a second application of that same freshening cold cream! You pat it in smartly. Feel the circulation stir. This way little glands and cells awaken. Fibres are strengthened. Your underskin is toned, quickened.

Miss Mary Augusta Biddle of the distinguished Philadelphia family: "Every time I use Pond's Cold Cream, I know my skin is going to look lovelier. Since using it, I haven't had a single blackhead, my pores seem smaller."

In a short time, your skin is better every way! Color livelier. Pores smaller. Lines softened. And those mean little blackheads and blemishes begin to show up less and less.

Get a jar of Pond's Cold Cream today. Begin the simple treatments described below. In two weeks see your skin growing lovelier—end all that worrying about ugly little skin faults.

Remember this treatment

Every night, cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream. As it brings out the dirt, stale make-up, and skin secretions—wipe it all off. Now pat in more cream—briskly. Rouse that failing underskin! Set it to work again—for that clear, smooth, line-free skin you want.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat this treatment with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin comes softer every time. Feels better, looks better, and now your powder goes on beautifully.

Keep up these Pond's patting treatments faithfully. As blackheads soften, take a clean tissue and press them out. Now blemishes will stop coming. Soon you will find that the very places where pores showed largest will be finer textured.

RIDING HOBBIES

Dick Powell takes a busman's holiday by snapping moving pictures off-the-set. Maybe he likes to turn the tables for a change and let someone else face the camera! Below, left to right, Margaret Lindsay shoots a mean arrow in her odd moments, and Dick Arlen tinkers with a new aerial for his short-wave radio contest with Bing Crosby. JUST A FUNNY OLD SONG EVERYBODY KNOWS

"WE sing, we sing, we sing of Lydia Pinkham," so go the words of an old song known on every college campus.

Old grads sing it at their class reunions.

The young people sing it when they gather around the piano at home on their college vacations.

And mother, listening, puts her book aside and joins in the chorus.

"How she saved, she saved, she saved the human race—" remember the words of the parody?

From laughing young lips that have never known the twist of pain it comes with gay abandon. Just a funny old school song everybody knows.

But to silver haired mothers who have run life's gauntlet, to women who have lain on the rack in childbirth, known the fiery ordeal of the "change"—these words bring grateful memories. To them it is much more than just a funny song.

Lydia E. Pinkham was a real woman

The song is a parody. But Lydia E. Pinkham was a very real person. In fact hers is one of the best known names in the history of American women.

She began her work in the light of little knowledge. Her laboratory was a kitchen. Her compounding vat an iron kettle on a New England kitchen stove.

But today her work is being carried on under the banner of modern science.

And now her product is made in a great plant occupying six modern factory buildings.

Not a Patent Medicine

You may be surprised to know that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is not a patent medicine.

On the contrary it is a standard proprietary compounded to aid women in facing the three major ordeals of their sex. It is to be found in every reputable drug store.

For three generations one woman has told another how to go "smiling through" with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It helps Nature tone up the system, thus lessening the discomforts* which must be endured, especially during

We who carry on the work of Lydia Pinkham do not offer this Vegetable Compound as a panacea or a cure-all.

We do know it has been tested and approved by women of three generations. We do know that a million women have written to tell us it has been helpful during the three most difficult ordeals of their sex: adolescence, motherhood and "middle age."

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been advertised these many years. But no advertisement we have ever printed could compare with the word-of-mouth advertising from one grateful woman to another.

In our files are more than one million letters from women in every walk of life—letters on scented notepaper or on torn wrapping paper—letters from women who have known pain and have written to us without solicitation to tell us how helpful Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been to them.

If you are in need of help we can honestly advise you to give it a fair trial.

We know what it has done for others.

We have every reason to believe it will do the same for you. The Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company, Lynn, Massachusetts, U. S. A.

You'll find this chart simple to follow and a valuable guide in choosing film entertainment. Instead of giving you the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 5★, extraordinary; 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

RUTH, BEFORE YOU LEAVE COLLEGE, PLEASE SEE A DENTIST. I'VE NOTICED THAT OFTEN BAD BREATH...
MOST BAD BREATH COMES FROM DECAYING FOOD PARTICLES IN HIDDEN CREVICES BETWEEN IMPROPERLY CLEANED TEETH. I ADVISE COLGATE DENTAL CREAM. ITS SPECIAL PENETRATING FOAM REMOVES THESE ODOR-BREEDING DEPOSITS!
THEN...THANKS TO COLGATE'S...
...AND TODAY JIM ASKED ME TO THE PROM!
NO WONDER YOU'VE CHANGED YOUR MIND ABOUT LEAVING COLLEGE!

MOST BAD BREATH BEGINS WITH THE TEETH!

Tests prove that 76% of all people over the age of 17 have bad breath! And the same tests prove that most bad breath comes from improperly cleaned teeth. Colgate Dental Cream, because of its special penetrating foam, removes the cause—the decaying food deposits in hidden crevices between teeth which are the source of most bad breath, dull, dingy teeth, and much tooth decay. At the same time, Colgate's soft, safe polishing agent cleans and brightens enamel—makes teeth sparkle!

As Nelson Eddy Sees Himself

He was saying, his voice amused, "I drive about in a modest black coupe. I sport no flashing yellow car with two men dressed in tan on the box and a couple of Great Danes to act as town criers. Car salesmen of all kinds besiege me. They urge me, saying, 'You should drive about in a flashy car. You owe it to yourself. It's swell publicity.' But that's just what I don't want—that 'swell publicity.'

"I strive to be inconspicuous. For the most part I succeed, I think. More than one well-wisher, who has only seen me on the screen, meets me for the first time, takes a good look at me, horn-rimmed glasses and all and says, with engaging frankness, 'Oh, I didn't recognize you, Mister Eddy. Well, you certainly are better looking on the screen. Wonderful what they can do, isn't it?'" (But he isn't better looking on the screen.)

"I can't see myself as any exalted figure," Nelson went on, lighting with cherishing care one of his allotted seven cigarettes a day, "because I have so little of intrinsic value to feel exalted about. My real friends think no more of me now than they did when I was working on a newspaper in Philadelphia. My mother doesn't think any more of me than she did when I sang in the church choir back home. No, when I take a good look at myself, I see myself as—a distinct disappointment to myself.

"I feel less important now than I did four years ago. Because, a few years ago, I stood for something in Art. I fancied myself, then, as a fine, upstanding young man who had a mission in life. I believed in my mission. And it was to sing the best music in the world to my public and I meant never to compromise with the best there was in me—and in music.

"I had a career in opera and in concert. Now I have, also, careers in pictures and on the air. I have compromised. I haven't sung and I am not singing now only the best music in the world. I enjoy making pictures, I enjoy broadcasting, but I have no conceit because I feel, within myself, that I am less than I was—not more.

I AM increasing my capacity, that's all. I can only hope to do what I am doing better than I did it last year. I do no more concerts than I ever did. I sing to larger audiences because my various careers have what is known as cumulative value. I can only do one picture a year and so I hope to make that a good picture. My main idea this year is to do as good a job as possible in 'Maytime.' (Incidentally, Metro is just as serious as he is about this business of making "Maytime" the best Nelson Eddy-Jeanette MacDonald picture to date. Several weeks' shooting was scrapped. A new director engaged, the original musical scores completely revised; in fact, neither trouble nor money has been spared to keep up the high standard set by this team's previous films.)

"I see myself," said Nelson, and now he didn't laugh, instead he sat forward on his chair, his hands clasped between his knees, his blue eyes on some remote horizon above and beyond my attentive head, "as an old fiddle. I hope quite a good old fiddle, really, a Stradivarius, perhaps. Not one of the kind you can pick up in a second-hand shop for ten dollars.

"I'm not a creative artist. I create nothing, really. I sing the songs the poets have written, dressed in musical clothes by gifted composers. I sing them to the best of my ability, but I, as every other singer, am a teller of tales. I try to be a good story teller. I hope that those who hear me will be touched as I am touched. It's not just a matter of 'Hear how pretty my voice is!'

"Mostly, I hope that they will get the story. I don't want people to come to hear an accomplished vocalist in a dress suit. I don't want them to think that I am thinking: 'Get that trill, isn't it a pip?' I don't want them to say, 'He has taken lessons for fifteen years, his technique should be perfect.' I want them to forget me, forget technique, hear only what I tell.

"When I sing a song, on screen or air, about, 'Oh, do not go, come home to me' I tear my heart out to make that guy come home. It doesn't much matter what voice I'm in so long as my heart is in it— and your heart, too.

"When I sing a song about a young soldier being led away to die for some minor infraction of discipline, led away by a firing squad comprised of his own buddies whose feet lag on the dreadful way . . .

SAY MARGE— WHAT'S — A PIMPLY SKIN ALMOST PUT A STOP TO MARGE'S "DATES"
I ALMOST FELL OVER WHEN DICK TURNED UP AT THE DANCE WITH LOUISE INSTEAD OF YOU. MARGE, HAVE YOU TWO HAD A BUST-UP?
OF COURSE NOT, SILLY! DICK DOESN'T HAVE TO ASK ME TO EVERYTHING, DOES HE?
REMEMBER NOW-YOU'VE GOT TO EAT THESE YEAST CAKES EVERY DAY. THEY'RE GRAND PIMPLE CHASERS - I KNOW - I'VE TRIED THEM
OH TRUDY - DO YOU REALLY MEAN IT - I'VE BEEN SO MISERABLE GOING AROUND LOOKING LIKE THIS ...
GROCERIES
LATER
TRUDY - IT'S MARGE LISTEN DARLING - DICK'S ASKED ME TO THE DANCE NEXT WEEK - UH - HUH - JUST LIKE YOU SAID HE WOULD - ISN'T IT WONDERFUL?
I TOLD YOU THOSE YEAST CAKES WOULD FIX THINGS UP

when I sing, 'Come on, keep step!' in the words of the doomed boy urging his faltering comrades on, gallant at the mouth of the grave—well, if you don't choke up and forget to consider whether my voice is trained or not, then I have failed completely.

"I'd rather tell the story of the Prodigal Son come home and make people care that that boy had come home, than I would to sing a Donizetti aria with all of the music-conscious people checking my technique, their pulses regular, their blood unstirred.

MANY singers have sung the Lord's Prayer far better, far more perfectly than I have ever sung it. But I forget that I am giving a performance on the air or in concert when I sing it. I am conscious only of the mighty, magnificent words. I am humbly and thrillingly conscious that this prayer has been said, not on platforms, but by millions of people on their knees, since the dawn of Christianity.

"I am an instrument. Honestly, from my heart, this is as I see myself. And seeing myself so, how can I be anything but humble in my own esteem?"

And suddenly, as Nelson talked, I knew why he is great despite his modest self-appraisal. It is because of his honest humility. It is not, really, because of his voice, nor because he is a movie idol. It is not because he is young and somehow Olympian. It is because he is all these things—and doesn't care. Or rather because he still cares so much more for the shadow than for the substance, for the spirit than for the letter.

He is great and beloved because his sense of values is sound and because he knows that greatness and glamor have nothing to do, the one with the other. The limelight, he says, is not a halo. Audiences do not always applaud the hero. Glamor is a synthetic greatness, a man-made article.

"No," said Nelson, "glamor is not greatness, nor the reverse. I have always found true greatness in very humble and unheralded people and things.

"Greatness is a relative matter, after all. It doesn't depend on an audience. The Queen who raises her sovereign hand to bestow largess on 20,000 persons is no greater than some dear little old lady who hands out a piece of pie to a tramp. It is all in ratio to our capacities and not to the number of people who applaud our capacities—and pay for the privilege.

There's a strong family resemblance here, what? Nelson Eddy at the Troc with his genial mother.

"I recently spent two hours flat on my stomach wriggling about after a little ant who was carrying an egg to its home. That little speck carried that egg, once again as big as itself, over stubble and concrete, around tree trunks and through brambles, up hillocks that were, comparatively, what the unscalable Alp would be to a man. It went on such a journey as I have never made in my life and never could make. I wouldn't have the courage nor the stamina. It hits you between the eyes, this sort of thing. Makes you feel pretty stupid, pretty humble and unimportant. It deflates the gassy balloon of the ego. It 'places' a fellow in the scheme of things.

"I would rather have some little kid riding along on his bike yell 'hullo' at me because he liked my face, than to have the adulation of fans the world over as much as I value and appreciate fan favor. And I do. I'd rather have the kind of a face that kids say hullo to than the kind of a face girls frame for their boudoirs. Because you have to approach a kid with sincerity and the kids know whether the sincerity is a specious thing or whether it is really there. I really feel inflated and swell out my chest when I yell hullo at some youngster and his face brightens and he yells back at me. I feel kind of great, then.

"And so," said Nelson, lighting his second cigarette of the allotted daily seven, relaxing and laughing again, "I see myself as a humble enough fellow, not to be compared, heroically, with the adventurous ant—but with the kind of a face kids take to, and," he said, emphatically, as I rose to go, "as a very good old fiddle, mind you—if not a Stradivarius, at least an Amati."

HAPPENED TO THE BOY FRIEND LATELY
LOOK - THERE'S DICK NOW! MAYBE HE'S COMING IN! NOPE - DIDN'T EVEN LOOK THIS WAY_MARGE YOU OUGHT TO DO SOMETHING ABOUT THIS-
BUT, TRUDY - HOW CAN I? YOU KNOW HOW PRETTY LOUISE IS - AND JUST LOOK AT ME WITH ALL THESE AWFUL PIMPLES
MARGE - I BET THAT'S THE WHOLE TROUBLE. IF YOU GET RID OF THOSE PIMPLES EVERYTHING WILL BE ALL RIGHT - LISTEN, FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST IS WHAT YOU NEED - C'MON, LET'S GET SOME NOW!

GOSH MARGE - YOU SURE DO LOOK PRETTY - SAY, HOW ABOUT MAKING A DATE RIGHT NOW FOR THE MOVIES TOMORROW?
I'D ADORE TO, DICK

DON'T LET ADOLESCENT PIMPLES KEEP YOUR BOY FRIENDS FROM MAKING DATES

PIMPLES often call a halt to good times for many girls and boys after the start of adolescence.

At this time, between 13 to 25, important glands develop and final growth takes place. The entire body is disturbed. The skin gets oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin. Pimples pop out.

If you are bothered by adolescent pimples, do as thousands of others—eat Fleischmann's fresh Yeast. It clears these skin irritants out of the blood. And then—pimples vanish!

Eat 3 cakes daily—one before each meal—plain, or in a little water—until your skin is entirely clear again. Start today!

they sat back and said: "Just wait till somebody gets really hurt; then you'll see action!"

And then, Connie, as I started to tell you at the outset, discovered the dressing-room set-up! She discovered that Janet, old-timer on the lot, had a lovely dressing-room with most of the finer fittings, while for Connie herself, there was just one of those four-canvas-walls affairs around a dressing table and a couple of rickety chairs.

From that moment, there was action! It became a free-for-all. They continued to smile at each other, but Lucrezia Borgia must have smiled just like that when she flavored her rival's tea with aconite.

FIRST development was that picture production became secondary, for the moment, to the production of fancy dressing-rooms. Connie pointed out that as a star herself, she'd always been used to and certainly had the right to, at least, as nifty a dressing-room as anybody else on the picture, no matter who. Even Janet Gaynor. What's more, Connie decided she wanted her dressing-room equipped with an electric plate, so she could brew tea when, and if, she felt like it.

They hunted all over the lot for a dressing-room with kitchenette. Nearest they could find was Warner Baxter's, with a refrigerator. You can't make tea on a refrigerator. Anyway, Warner wanted his own dressing-room.

Finally, they borrowed a dressing-room for Connie from M-G-M, where she knew they had a fine one. It had an electric plate. They trundled it all the way from Culver City to Westwood Hills, and installed it for Connie. She scored that point.

Janet came back strong, though. One of her seconds found a tape measure, and reported back that Connie's borrowed dressing-room, with range, measured two feet longer and one foot, ten inches wider, than Janet's. Janet went into action. "Who," she demanded, in effect, if not in those exact words, "has top billing on this production, under contract?"

They looked it up and found that the billing was to be: Janet Gaynor, Constance Bennett, and Loretta Young, with Simone Simon, in "Ladies in Love."

"All right, then," continued the Janet barrage, "top billing rates at least as big a dressing-room as second billing!"

When Janet goes into action, she's a whirlwind. She's been in battles; she knows her stuff. Connie retreated under the barrage. Hammers banged, saws snarled—and before you could say "Ladies in Love" there was a new dressing-room for Janet, near Connie's but with a safe distance between. Its measurements tallied exactly with those of the borrowed affair. Janet had evened the round.

Meantime, Loretta and Simone had been in action, too. Not only Janet got a new big dressing-room, but hastily, similarly luxurious ones were provided for these other two. Over at one side of the set, it began to look like an auto-trailer display lot with Loretta's, Janet's, Simone's and Connie's portable, but big, dressing-rooms all lined up.

From that time on, the picture began to be called "The Parade of the Dressing-Rooms." The sixty-odd sets, called for in the action, had to be built on different stages. When the company moved from one stage to another, all traffic on the studio lot had to be re-routed while the but Jergens brought about an early Thaw!

I NEARLY CRIED when Dave complained about my hands. I hated them myself—all harsh and red. They stayed rough all winter, no matter what I put on them . .

HANDS can be thrilling when they're soft and smooth. But cold, wind and water take the natural moisture from hand skin—make it likely to chap and roughen. And most women wash their hands eight times a day, they say—have them in water eight times more.

But Jergens Lotion heals and softens dry, harsh hands amazingly fast. Why? . . . Because Jergens goes into the skin cells more effectively than other lotions tested, and swiftly puts back lost moisture. Besides — Jergens contains two special ingredients, used by doctors. Red, rough, chapped skin is made soft, white and fine in just a few applications. Jergens is never sticky. Use Jergens faithfully. At all drug, department, 10¢ stores.

ponderous dressing-rooms, mounted or hauled behind ten-ton trucks, rolled to the new location.

Also in the parade were the stars' cars. Connie took the lead there—because she had two cars for herself. Studios, you know, are required to furnish, at stars' demands, what are called "stand-by" autos—a limousine, with chauffeur, to stand by the set throughout the working day, to be ready at instant's notice to transport the star from stage to restaurant, or main dressing-room building, or wherever she may want to go.

ON the very first day, Connie exercised her prerogative, and had a studio stand-by car at the corner of the stage at all times. It didn't matter at all that Connie's own car—that expensive foreign town car with the wickerwork-side effect, and her own chauffeur at the wheel, also stood by throughout the working day, at the corner of the stage. The chauffeurs—Connie's and the studio's—spent hours staring at each other. Now and then, they varied that by wondering what they were there for—because almost invariably, Connie ignored both cars when she left the stage for the main dressing-room building. After all, it wasn't more than 35 yards from the stage exit to the other! ! !

Incidentally, most of the action of the picture was shot on what is called the Will Rogers Memorial Stage—the new one on the lot, dedicated to the memory of the great comedian. If, as many insist, Will's ghost still hangs around the stage, he must have had a swell Rogers time watching Janet, Connie, Loretta and Simone. . . . . ! It would have been Will's meat!

Now, in the midst of the dressing-room free-for-all, and all the other things that happened, there was always the most punctiliously-maintained outward air of wholehearted friendship you could ever wish for. Let no one imagine, for a moment, that Connie ever glared at Janet, that Loretta ever scowled at Simone, that Simone ever stuck her tongue out at Connie, that Janet ever made a moué at Loretta. Ah, me, no! A thousand times, no!

"Those girls," said one big-shot worker on the set to me, afterward, "were so perfectly sweet to each other all day long that I used to have to drink a tumblerful of vinegar, neat, for an antidote every night!"

Honestly (don't laugh, I tell you!) the gals were the acme of courtesy to each other. They were so courteous that it produced the biggest laugh of the production during an early stage of the shooting.

It seemed that on this day, all four of them were smitten with the same idea at more or less the same time. Each decided that she'd show the world that there weren't any jealousies or hard feelings or anything like that—why, just to prove that she liked and loved the other girls, she'd have them to tea that very afternoon!

So, during the day, orders arrived at the Cafe de Paris, the studio restaurant. Came an order from Connie: "Serve tea, for four, on the set at four this afternoon."

Soon came a similar order from Janet. In quick succession, identical orders came from Loretta, from Simone.

Nick, the crafty gentleman who runs the studio restaurant, never cracked a smile. Nick has a sense of humor all his own. He must have known that all four of them intended to ask the other three to tea, in her dressing-room, at four. So what did Nick do? Why, Nick obeyed all orders implicitly, as any first-rate functionary in his position would! And at four in the afternoon, a parade of waitresses and bus-boys wound its way from the glittering Cafe de Paris to the "Ladies in Love" set—and four steaming services of tea-for-four, with cakes, cookies and all the other trimmings, were set up.

Of course, it was a howl. Even Connie, Loretta, Janet and Simone saw the joke. They pooled resources—and had a tea-party on the set with a lot of others being invited in to use up the excess tea-age.

But from that day on, they worked out a system of their own. Never again did they all try to serve tea to the others. Instead, Janet would order coffee in midmorning, one day; Simone would send out for ice-cream cones later on; maybe it'd be Loretta's turn to preside at four o'clock tea. They took turns.

And it's a gross untruth that any one of them ever bribed a scene-shifter to taste the coffee or tea first.

TOUGHEST job on the whole production was not Director Griffith's, as you might suspect. It was Cameraman Hal Mohr's. Hal Mohr, veteran of the studios, knows his stars. When he got the "Ladies in Love" assignment, he groaned—but vowed to do his best. He knew, you see, that he had perhaps the four most difficult camera stars in Hollywood. They all take, for best screening, different lighting and different camera-angles.

Because of the shape of her face, a camera has to "shoot up" at Connie to get the best picture of her. It's the same with Simone, so when Simone and Connie were in scenes together, it was easy camera work. But—you have to shoot down on Loretta, and with Gaynor, you shoot on a level with her face.

"My camera did more nip-ups on that picture than in all the rest of my experience in Hollywood put together," said Hal, afterward. But at the same time, he insists, he probably did the best work of his career on the film.

"I had to," he grins. "I was up on my toes every moment. I'm a big man (he stands well over six feet, and is built in proportion), but I was in a spot. If I'd given one of those four girls a better camera break than the others, the other three would have been off me for life. And I'm their friend—all of 'em!"

He insists he never shot Bennett better. He swears you'll see a more photographically lovely Gaynor than ever before. Loretta, whether or not she's been ill, never appeared more beautiful. And Simone—a camera problem if ever there was one, with that funny little face of hers—comes out of the screen even more challenging than in "Girls' Dormitory."

"Which is best?" I was fool enough to ask Mohr. He threw an ashtray at me.

The lighting, too, was Mohr's job. What made it tough was the fact that each of the girls—with the possible exception of Simone—is herself an expert on camera angles and set lighting. Each girl knows how she appears best, and since the requirements for all four were different, both as to lights and camera angles, each of them was on the lookout, with fire in her eyes, for any break that might give a photographic advantage to any of the others.

"When those four girls began to move into position for a 'take,'" I was told afterward, "it looked like a football squad in training. They'd shift and move positions around each other until Griffith and Mohr got dizzy trying to locate them. Each was after her best spot—for the lights and the cameras."

Mohr and the electricians huddled long, long hours. In scenes where there was no "cross-over"—that is, where Bennett stayed on one side of the set, for example, while Gaynor stayed on the other, it was easy enough. They simply lighted Bennett's side in the Bennett way, and Gaynor's side in hers. But there were many scenes where they did have to cross and re-cross. Then they had to rig up two completely different lighting sets on each side of the stage and had to hook them up with a series of trick gadgets, so that an expert electrician played the lights like an organist at his keyboard, as Bennett and Gaynor and the others crossed and moved.

And the question of "good side" and "bad side" . . . ! ! ! You fans all know that there isn't an actress whose face doesn't photograph better from one side than from the other. And you know, too, that even in a picture wherein she stars alone, no actress who's wise is going to let the camera catch her bad side if she can help it. Then imagine the situation on "Ladies in Love!" I don't mean to reveal any stage secrets, but the tricks that were done with mirrors!

INEVITABLY, there were scenes where no tricks could be used—two of the stars had to face each other for close-ups. It happened that in several of these spots, it was inescapable that one of the two had to present her good side to the camera, while the other had to turn her bad side.

"What," I asked my informant, "did you do?"

"We did our damnedest, and trusted to God," he said.

Hal Mohr's job wasn't any tougher, though, than Anthony Ugrin's. He's the still photographer on the picture. He's the one who takes the pictures that you see in theatre lobbies. He's used to working with Shirley Temple. But it was no child's play when they suddenly dumped Connie, Janet, Loretta and Simone on him and expected him to take stills that would satisfy all of them in the same shot!

You see, stars' contracts give them the right to reject any stills that don't please them.

When the stills were brought around to the set during production, Connie usually seemed to get first crack at them. Well, naturally, Connie or anyone else for that matter would okay the stills that presented her in the best light, regardless of the others. And equally naturally, if you were in her place, you'd tear the corner off (that's the customary way to reject a still) any shot that made you look like a frump in comparison with one of the other girls, eh?

So, when Janet got done with what Connie'd not torn the corners off, and Loretta got done with what Janet had left, and Simone got done with what Loretta had left, poor Anthony Ugrin hardly ever had any stills left to turn in to the publicity department. I don't know, to this day, what the publicity head of the studio's press department did for "Ladies in Love" stills. He is a genius. He had to be, this time! Maybe Ugrin was just a blind; maybe the publicity department had another still man shooting from concealment somewhere.

One factor about the picture has astounded Hollywood. Before production began, everybody predicted that if the picture was ever finished, it would be months behind schedule. They couldn't imagine four stars of that calibre going through a picture without the schedule being completely wrecked by temperament. But they were wrong—the delay that did happen to bring the picture in a few days late was due, not to explosions between the four, but to illness—with one exception.

THE one blow-up came when Connie learned that a certain scene was being rewritten to give the breaks to Simone.

You see, the studio is building Simone toward top stardom. Connie is not on contract there. It's good business to build up one's own star at the expense of a free-lance player—if one can get away with it. They tried it on Connie.

They rewrote a scene where Simone pops up from behind a divan, right in the midst of a love scene between Connie and Paul Lukas. It was, originally, pretty much Connie's scene. The new script made it completely Simone's.

Connie hit the ceiling.

"It isn't because of me," she announced, "but it's because of the story!" This new script, she insisted, stopped the story just to give Simone a chance to parade her stuff. It was like slipping a vaudeville act into the middle of "Romeo and Juliet." Connie stood pat.

Director Griffith and others sided with her. And at last, they decided to resort to the original script.

Well, the picture's over, now. Loretta, as I said, went to Honolulu to recover. Connie is going back to England to make more movies there, starring alone. Simone is being plastered across billboards as the "Greatest Coming Star of the Screen." Janet has a new dressing-room, two feet longer and one foot, ten inches, wider than her old one. M-G-M has its dressing room back. Director E. H. Griffith is resting. Cinematographer Hal Mohr is sipping refreshing drinks in his hilltop home and telling his own movie-star wife, Evelyn Venable, "Don't ever, honey, play in any four-star pictures except the kind that gets four stars from the critics."

And, despite the federal statutes prohibiting interstate shipments of prizefight films, "Ladies in Love" will be on your own neighborhood screens by the time you read this. Then you can go to see for yourself and award the decision to Connie, or Loretta, or Simone, or Janet—if any—because the camera never lies. Or does it?

Simone Simon and William Wyler have been seeing a lot of each other lately. Here they are at the tennis matches.

Along Came Fate

better. It lasted a week. Long enough for Frank Gregory, the director, to become interested in Beverly's work. He was, it seemed, going to do a production in London. If she went over he'd give her a role.

But how to get to London? You must, perforce, take a boat. And boats cost money.

"We can't let a small thing like that stop you!" protested Wanda Lydwell. Wanda was like that, a grand pal. Beverly grinned because they were pretty much two of a kind. Only Wanda had the price of a boat ticket and ten dollars a week spending money from her family. And Bev didn't. Suddenly the honey eyes flickered. "I have it! We'll give a benefit performance!"

Two girls, barely eighteen, launched on a mad lark. They went to the management of the Hotel Sutton and explained that they wanted a room in which to give a charity performance (but they neglected to say for what charity). They hired a two-piece orchestra, made five gallons of very terrible punch and invited everybody in New York, including the English consul. At five A. M. they sent the crowd home. Beverly was richer by $130, most of which was spent for a third-class passage. Then, with Wanda, she sailed with thirty dollars in her pocket.

Like two slim little ghosts they ploughed through London to find Frank Gregory. He was most cordial, most encouraging about the part but, of course, the play was not going to be produced until fall! In the meantime they had five months to live through somehow.

"I might make a good milk maid," said Beverly hopefully.

"Have pity on the cows!" chuckled Wanda. So they settled in a mews, one of those converted stables that can be had for a song, off Marble Arch. And soon famous people began to gather at that mews. Epstein, the sculptor. Emma Goldman, the anarchist. Dynamic, brilliant Paul Robeson, whose glorious voice rang out on many an evening so that the tenants tip-toed through the halls to listen ecstatically.

IT was a gay inspired life, but they were still jobless. Even the small rent became too much for the girls. "If we could only stretch this ten dollars a week that I get!" Wanda mourned. It was Emma Goldman who offered a solution. They could come to live in her apartment in Paris until fall. An excellent idea with one drawback—their two months' lease on the mews. English leases are hard to break, but not when a couple of ingenious American girls put their heads together. They gave a party. They gave a party that practically raised the roof off the old place because the girls had asked their friends to be as noisy as possible and the friends were most obliging. Needless to say, the landlord came the next day.

"We're so glad you're here!" they assured him to his complete bewilderment. Within five minutes he was so overcome he forgot he intended to put them out. He asked them to tea. For once charm had proved a boomerang. They explained the situation and he graciously tore up the lease, and they left for France.

There are times when Paris can be a wanton witch. This was one of them. Emma Goldman not only failed to meet their boat train but she wasn't even in town. She had, it appeared, gone to the south of France to help Paul Robeson write his book, quite forgetting her offer.

It was an inky black night, they had fifty francs between them and no place to go. Beverly began to whistle. She always whistles when she is frightened. She was to do a great deal of it in Paris.

"Where next?" shivered Wanda.

"A hotel that costs next to nothing," said Beverly firmly. They found it in the Montmartre district. There were cabbage roses on the wall and the man in the room below beat his wife at six every morning. Lovely atmosphere. And yet, this was the spot where Necessity (some call it Fate) opened a new door to Beverly. She had never done much singing, never knew she had a voice. But somewhere she had picked up a few cute French songs. One evening, driven by hunger, she sang them for the "patron" of the Noctambules Cafe nearby. She put on an act. It was a good act. Thereafter she sang at the Noctambules for five francs a night and two meals. The same people came time after time. French shopkeepers and artisans. Often they sang along with her.

After Beverly had finished work one night, the two of them walked across to the Seine. It had been hatefully stuffy in the cafe. The cool night air felt soft and bracing. Paris at night—there was something fascinating about it even when seen from the seamy side.

Under the shadow of the great Notre Dame Cathedral, they saw a man bending low over the river. Both girls raced for the bank. But apparently he had no thought of committing suicide; he was washing his shirt. A tramp. But a tremendously intelligent "tramp" who had been an engineer in Marseilles before the depression caught up with him. Other "tramps" came from under the bridge. An ace flyer, an artist, a chap who spoke seven languages and knew New York like a book. They were all sitting there talking rapidly when the great bell tolled midnight and two gendarmes wandered down to investigate. There was a sharp word, a command. One of the pompous little French officers was brutal, ugly. He knocked down the engineer. Afterwards they never could tell who actually did it, but one of the girls struck the officer.

"Insulting the law and disturbing the peace" were the charges brought against them when the girls were hustled into night court. The whole thing was preposterous but, when you know only about a hundred and fifty words of a foreign language, it's not easy to explain. Beverly and Wanda found themselves looking through the bars of the Place Vendome jail!

INSIDE the bars they saw dope fiends, thieves, murderers. One old hag tried to teach them her trade of picking pockets. Gendarmes came by, pretending to offer them drinks of cold water, spilling it before they could take it. Their trial was postponed and they were transferred to the women's prison of La Roquette. You could, thought Beverly, rot in a French jail before anyone found out. She lost six pounds and grew six years in experience during those nine days in jail. And then Wanda got word to a business associate of her father's and her family went into action. Mr. Lydwell was a respresentative of the Shepherd Hotels in Egypt. He had considerable influence. It ended with the French government apologizing to the girls, and they returned to England.

No more mews. No more cabbage roses on the walls. This time the Lydwells had arrived and taken things in hand. Beverly was ensconced in a suite at the Hotel Savoy!

"Now," she told Wanda expressively, "I know how Cinderella felt! From prunes to princes—that's us!" And it was. Quite literally.

Instead of going into the Frank Gregory production she maneuvered a part in "Service" with Percy Marmont. Shortly after it closed the Lydwells decided to fly to Paris. Beverly went to see them off and at the last minute flew with them. She is probably the only woman in existence who ever stayed four days at the fashionable St. Meurice without so much as an overnight bag. And it was during those four days that she met the Prince. The gentleman now known as King Edward VIII.

It was at the Crillon Bar. Wanda's people had known him for years because he kept his favorite dog at their kennels at Biarritz. Beverly saw a rather tired young man sitting there and then Mr. Lydwell was introducing her to him. They talked. They went for a ride with the Prince himself driving. And as they passed the Place Vendome jail she thought, "Life is certainly queerish!"

BUT the queerest twist of all was yet to come. Back in New York again she attended a cocktail party at which Maurice Chalone, noted decorator of night clubs, was also a guest. He was just opening a new one, Boeuf Sur le Toit. During the evening Beverly sang the French songs she'd sung at the Noctambules. Sang them with the flair she'd learned to put in them there. She did it only for a laugh, but at the end Chalone was saying, "I'll give you a contract. I'll give you $150 a week to sing those songs that way at 'Le Toit.'"

She sang there for six months. Then moved on to the Town Casino. That was where Mildred Webber, talent scout for Warner Brothers, saw her. Within a week Beverly Roberts was on her way to Hollywood.

She never has been married. Never been in love, except once. That was with a famous neurologist who had a daughter four years older than herself. "That couldn't work out," said Beverly to Beverly. "I shan't see him again." And she hasn't.

"You know the character of Conway in 'Lost Horizon'?" she asks. "That's my man!" So far she has found him only in a book.

Once in Hollywood she went directly into "The Singing Kid" with Al Jolson. In nine months she has made five pictures, her most recent one was "China Clipper." The part in "God's Country and the Woman" came almost as an anticlimax. She'd been so sure she wouldn't get it.

Beverly has her parents, brother and even the little family cat with her now. "It's grand to be together again. But I wouldn't give up my experiences during the last four years—and some of them have been pretty terrible—for anything in the world. Everything that's happened to me has been part of a definite pattern leading here."

laugh instead because they can't help it and Frank, looking as relieved as a small boy who has just escaped a spanking, laughs harder than anyone.

The majority of ineffectual people never accomplish anything, but Frank Morgan, by virtue of being ineffectual, has accomplished just about everything he set out to do in his whole life, and with a minimum of apparent effort.

He didn't reach the top of his profession until he used this natural characteristic professionally, and then he became a sensation. Of course, he was a Broadway star, but out in Hollywood success is figured by the bank balance. It was when Mr. Morgan went almost totally ineffectual in "The Affairs of Cellini," that his cinema business began to pick up and his salary, multiplied by ten, has been rising steadily ever since.

He could give lessons on how to relax and make it pay but he wouldn't. His particular brand of taking it easy is art in a big way. If you asked him about it, he would probably say, "Ah, er' — why —," give you that big smile and you would have forgotten by that time what it was you had asked.

If you stop and think, I believe you will agree that you laugh at him on the screen because he never ceases to struggle and never quite accomplishes what he starts out to do. That is, that's what you think, but you are wrong, because his intention was to amuse you and he succeeds by his stumbling, stuttering methods.

Certainly, he doesn't look funny. On the contrary, he is quite handsome, as you can see for yourself, and when he drives about town in his smart open roadster, wearing a beret and the latest word in sports clothes, he is quite the beau of the village. But the minute he pokes his head in the door, you laugh. He never makes wise-cracks, as do some of his contemporaries. In fact, his general conversation is usually quite serious in tone. He doesn't juggle (can you imagine him trying to juggle?) and he never, apparently, tries to be funny. But the result is a riot and he is one of the leading comedians on the screen.

It was quite by accident that he became a comedian on the stage. Always he had been the handsome, romantic hero until one night he forgot his lines. He stuttered and stammered until he could catch his cue and the audience shrieked with glee. The manager said it was inspirational and he has stuttered through his roles ever since.

Remember in "Dimples" that you laughed so hard when he danced because he didn't succeed in dancing very well? He's dancing again in "Maytime."

"But if they'd seen me in the other picture, they wouldn't have had me dance in 'Maytime,'" he declares.

"Before that picture I had never done any dancing, except for my own amusement, but I learned to tap—after a fashion—and it was something to write home about. It looked simple when Bill Robinson did it, but when I tried to take the steps I found myself trying to do the whole thing with my hands and face."

I went out to the set to watch him rehearse his dance for "Maytime," but long before I reached the stage I heard screams of laughter. Jessie Ralph was on the sidelines, laughing until the tears rolled down her cheeks.

"To think I talked all the way from Poughkeepsie to New York, advising him not to go on the stage!" she exclaimed. "And look at him now! I'll never give advice again."

That was when he was a very young man, and had gone to Poughkeepsie to see his brother, Ralph, open in "Broadway Jones." Jessie Ralph was in the show and on the way home he had confided to her his ambition to become an actor.

However, advice from any source never seemed to stop or even discourage him when he had a particular objective in mind.

Faced with the opposition of her parents, he won the girl of his choice, married her and for twenty years they have been happy.

Over the objections of his father and the advice of friends, he became an actor and rose to stardom on the New York stage. Before that he had been told by his father that he was no business man; that he was just a playboy.

Following this slight argument with his father, Frank decided to go out in the world and prove his ability along business lines. He tried out several jobs. It isn't impossible that one day when you answered your doorbell and found "that brush man there again," that it was Frank Morgan himself, for he did ring doorbells for a time in the interests of a new toothbrush he was selling from door to door.

Eventually he got a job in the advertising department of the Boston Traveler and, in spite of a salary that was decidedly insufficient, he stuck it out for a few months. When the Christmas holidays came around he resigned just because he thought Boston was too far away from his girl. To his amazement his boss asked him to stay and offered to raise his salary to the munificent sum of $35 a week.

"I can't stay," Frank told him, "but please put that offer in writing so I can show it to my father."

Reinforced with this evidence of his business ability, Frank returned to work for his father, but his mind was on the theatre. His brother, Ralph, had become well known on the New York stage and had discarded the family name of Wupperman for Morgan, which Frank also took later for his stage name.

He knew Edgar Allan Wolfe, the author and producer of a vaudeville sketch, slightly—well enough to ask him for the job but not so well that Mr. Wolfe knew he was inexperienced. He got the job, after reciting a list of his successes with various stock companies, "All of them so far West that he couldn't check up," Mr. Morgan explained.

After the opening night his salary was raised to $75 a week. When he confessed that it was his first time on the stage, Mr. Wolfe said, "You were all right, just the same." and kept him on.

He had met his sweetheart on a "blind date" and that's one time he wasn't late. Their romance was interrupted by every obstacle her parents could devise. When they learned that Frank aspired to be an actor, they rushed their daughter off to Europe. And even when he began to meet with considerable success, they didn't relent, so the young couple eloped.

They are one of the most popular married couples in Hollywood. No party is complete without them and, as one of his friends told me, "If you really want to laugh, you should see Frank at a party."

When Frank and his brothers were growing up and getting married, his father offered $5,000 to the son who had the first baby boy. Frank, the baby of the family, yelled his objections to this offer for his brothers were getting married, one by one, and he was only eighteen years old. The offer stood, however, and for the next several years Frank's most worried moments were when one of his brothers' families was "blessed eventing." Always he suffered more than the expectant father, but each time, to his great relief, the stork left a girl. It was probably his most triumphant moment when, years later, his wife presented him with a son—the first grandson—and he won the $5,000.

Another incident, which gave him the greatest personal satisfaction, was his election to a vice-presidency in the business left by his father.

Having made a name for himself as a comedian on Broadway, he confesses he came to Hollywood hoping to repeat some of his stage successes in pictures. But Hollywood, in characteristic fashion, decided he should represent the serious side of life; uphold the dignity of the community and, in other words, be a pillar of society.

"And there's nothing more depressing than to be a pillar," Frank groaned. "I always was cast as a banker, who went around muttering about money, or a father who worried over his wayward children."

His contract held him in Hollywood for two years or more before his great opportunity came in "The Affairs of Cellini," which he romped through with all the zest he had been forced to keep under cover. Since then he hasn't been in a bank—in a picture—and at the moment he is in such constant demand that he can't get a holiday. He would like to do an occasional play but having reached that four-figure salary stage, declares he can't afford to.

"It's not only the difference in salary that I would lose," he explained, "but the time off the screen."

The two Morgans are constantly confused, even in the minds of their friends, "but the only time I object," Frank says, "is when I read in the paper that I've gone to Europe, where I want to go, and it's really Ralph who has gone."

"I'll Never Dance with Astaire!" Says Eleanor Powell

you're good, but not so hot,' I'd love it. I want even that much admiration from him. It would mean more coming from him than from anyone else, for I know he is doing the thing he loves, and that it's the biggest thing in his life. But I'm just as sure we'll never share it. You can say for me to all the people who've wanted to know about it that we'll never dance together."

YOU can be pretty safe in calling that modesty. Nothing else could have prompted a decision affecting the two greatest dancers in the world.

"In a rehearsal hall we could talk our stuff, but that's all," she surmised. "Fred wouldn't dance with me. He'd know we could never be a team because we're utterly different. You see," leaping up, "this is Astaire." Suddenly the air was full of legs that seemed to hit the ceiling. "And this is me." Her feet tapped the floor like drumsticks.

What I did see, aside from a free show, was that Eleanor Powell could be both herself and Fred Astaire.

"But," she chirped, lighting like a bird, "we have one thing in common, and that's our ballet training. You can see it in Fred's poses. But tap is just as difficult as ballet, and the competition is far keener. There are only four well-known tap dancers, Astaire, Bill Robinson, Ruby Keeler and Ginger Rogers"—she was leaving out herself—"while there are twenty or thirty premier ballet dancers."

GETTING in the tap class is like being among champion fighters. And it calls for the same strict training. A girl's tap dancing all depends on the life she leads. She must do no drinking, no smoking, and be early to bed. That gives her a tight figure and keeps her eternally young. All the fun I have is going across the street to see a picture. I like dramatic pictures. It's the same with plays. All the time I was in New York I didn't go to a single musical show. As for night clubs, I hate them. I don't drink or smoke, so why should I sit around and put on the Ritz? That's what makes it so hard for me to find a boy friend. With them it's nothing but let's go, let's go! They're all so modern that they don't think of anything else. I should have lived in the time when lordly gentlemen put down their cloaks for dainty ladies to cross a mud puddle."

She hopped up and demonstrated romance in the spacious days of back-bending gallantry.

"But I never even get any mash notes," she confessed. "That's all right with me, because I couldn't do anything about them. I have no time for love. People ask me why I don't go out on Saturday nights. The answer is, I go to bed and stay there through Sunday. The rest of the time I'm working. But it's worth it, for today tap dancing is put on the level of art. That's why I'm now proud to say I am Eleanor Powell, tap dancer. I'm prouder still of being able to do twenty-two pirouettes, more than Nijinsky ever did. That is the one thing that makes me different from anyone else in the world."

"BUT both Astaire and I have the same peculiarity," she was happy to say. "Fred dreams his dances, Irving Berlin told me, and so do I. At other times I dream I can't dance a step, and wake up in cold terror. But the funny part of it is that when I am dancing, I don't know what I'm doing. My feet think ahead of my mind. All my dancing is a matter of feeling. Of course, I have to think out things before I get going, and I always try to think out something new. In 'Born to Dance' I do a high-kick waltz among a lot of trees."

"Would you trade one of the trees for Astaire?"

"One?" she cried. "I'd trade 'em all!"

"Life Ends at Forty!"

break in pictures. I'm grateful to Hollywood for all that it has given me. I'd do it all over again, if I had the chance. What would I have been, if I hadn't found a place on the stage or screen? A truck driver, maybe. Or an oil driller. I worked at that once, you know. I have no illusions about my abilities and capabilities. I know I'm just a lucky fool. Life dealt me all the aces. But, I'll confess, the future worries me.

"I know I'm good for only so many years. Then I'm through. And what happens next? For the last year or two I've been doing all the things which I should be looking forward to doing in the next ten or fifteen years. I've had freedom from financial worries, a comfortable home, enough leisure to hunt and fish when the spirit moved me and to do some travelling. If my life were like that of the normal, average man, all that would be before me, instead of behind me, when they put the forty candles on my birthday cake.

I'M not a business man and I have no profession or training except for the stage and screen. So I don't know what kind of work I can do when I'm washed up in the only line I know. In this age of specialization it's the experienced men, not the rank amateurs, who are in demand. And it's hard to begin something new after forty.

"I'll tell you a little secret. Each year the old, simple country life, the very kind of living from which I once ran away to escape, becomes more and more attractive to me. I guess I'm still a farm boy at heart. As I grow older, it seems to be taking hold of me. When I look around at all the hectic worry and work of Hollywood, I long for the time when I can get away from it all and go back to peace and quiet, where no one knows or cares about movie stars and pictures and contracts and options.

"However, I'm wondering whether, when that time finally comes, I'll still be so crazy about it. The grass on the other side of the fence is always greener, you know. Maybe if I go back to the farm, it will turn out to be as monotonous as it was before and I'll want to break away again."

His years of Hollywood success have done a great deal for Clark and he is honestly and sincerely grateful. He tries to prove his gratitude by doing his best possible work in every picture and by registering no complaints when he is assigned roles which he does not like. Other actors, not so wise as Clark, have protested violently against pictures and parts which they did not wish to play. Many of them have fallen by the wayside, while Clark has plodded steadily and surely onward and upward.

"I'm paid to work in pictures, not to run the studio," Clark told me once, speaking with the sane, sturdy wisdom of his Pennsylvania and Ohio ancestors.

Clark is one of the fortunate few who has kept his head and managed to be in Hollywood without becoming a part of it. He has taken only the best from the town and has wisely discarded the empty glitter. Hollywood has given him success and money, a smoothly polished exterior, an easy inward poise, which he never could have gained elsewhere. But it has not turned his head or made him forget that his day of glory is tragically short.

He has many acquaintances but very few intimate friends in the picture colony. He has never had any desire for social success. He has always enjoyed the simpler things like small groups of congenial spirits around a blazing fire, hunting and fishing trips, long week-ends in the mountains or on the desert. He has established a well-balanced plan of living, work and play, occasional gay parties, frequent quiet week-ends, away from Hollywood where he doesn't have to shave or wear a collar from Friday night to Monday morning.

Before his separation from Ria Gable, they entertained frequently in their lovely, dignified Brentwood home and they were entertained by people whom they liked and enjoyed. Since the separation Clark has been living quietly in a Beverly Hills hotel, but his way of living has not been greatly changed. He still goes places now and then, usually escorting the blonde and gay Carole Lombard, and he still slips away alone for his long week-ends of hunting, fishing or camping.

ONE rainy Saturday night a short time ago one of the men from Clark's studio was driving to his mountain cabin. He stopped in a forlorn little restaurant in an even more forlorn little village along the way. There, to his surprise, he found Clark Gable, sitting with the shirt-sleeved proprietor, talking and drinking coffee. No one in Hollywood knew where Clark was. He said that he intended to drive on through the rain until he was tired and then find a place to sleep.

Down in Hollywood, on the other side of that curtain of rain, there were a dozen gay and sparkling parties, where Clark would have been more than welcome. But Clark was sitting at an oilcloth-covered table, drinking hot, strong coffee from a thick cup and swapping yarns with a middle-aged man, who didn't know or care that the tall, dark man in the rough gray sweater and the cap was one of the world's greatest screen idols.

But, when Clark doesn't have to come back to Hollywood on Sunday night or Monday morning, when he has unlimited time to hunt and fish and explore strange places, will he enjoy them as much as he does now, when he is stealing them from the busy excitement of his working life?

That's what Clark is wondering, too. His present contract will be ended when he is thirty-eight. He never wants to sign another like it. He hopes to make one or two pictures a year, good pictures, for two or three years. Then he believes that his day will be done. And before him will stretch the long, golden, empty years.

"All I hope is that I shall be able to find some enjoyable and profitable way to fill them," Clark said. "I don't want, and I can't afford, to be just an idler."

"I don't miss the round of entertainment because after awhile you tire of partying. Frances and I go out as much as we wish, but spare hours on our ranch are more appealing than you might suspect. Responsibilities are more exhilarating than the lack of them, another truth I have stumbled on!

"When you're playing at romance you pretend to be concerned with the current girl-friend's problems, but you aren't seriously interested. You can't be, unless her fate's intertwined with your own. If it is, you can heed her opinions and suggestions and trust her judgment completely."

Joel and his Frances have preserved their individuality by going on, publicly, as two separate stars. They don't mention each other except when it's necessary. They don't grant interviews on their colossal passion. They don't believe in that old Hollywood custom of romancing publicly.

LOVE has inspired me to buckle down in earnest," Joel maintains. "I'm not much of an actor yet, but I think I've shown some evidence of becoming one at last. The thanks belong to Frances. She is a sincere artist and always has attempted to do everything in her power with each role assigned to her. I figured I couldn't acquire any technique, that I could register sufficiently by 'being myself.' When I didn't relish a role, I would not strain myself. Love's made me far more conscientious. Now I try to be the character I'm portraying.

"Moderation is a splendid principle, even in love. Frances and I were offered a lot of money to do a picture together. We declined. It would have been capitalizing on our affection. If the roles had been marvelous, and we'd been qualified for them by our talent, that would have made a difference. But we visualized the publicity that would have been sent out. We'd be sold to the theatres to lure curiosity-seekers. If we hit as a team, they would have requested more and more films of us together. Then the more sensible fans would have commenced groaning, 'Oh, there are those two again! Can't they keep their love to themselves?' No, not for us.

"As time goes on, I'm more convinced it wouldn't be so smart for us to work together. Frances hasn't made a picture in some time—her last one was 'The Gay Deception.' But when both of us are working, we're anxious to get home, to recount what's happened on our respective jobs, and to relax in each other's company.

"Frances hasn't been in the Goldwyn Studios in the two years I've been under contract to Goldwyn, not even to visit. I've called for her on her set only occasionally. Then I've waited in her dressing-room. It's not professional to be hanging around, and if she were making a romantic scene it'd probably embarrass both her leading man and me. No wife would run down to her husband's oil station and sit there all day, watching him pump gas. No wife wants her husband underfoot when she's attending to her business."

Although Joel did select a successful actress when he picked his bride, Frances Dee isn't the superficial type. She manages to provide Joel with as pleasant a home as that to which his mother accustomed him. And there's no furious pace about their menage, either.

The producers have an altered attitude towards him since he has married, Joel disclosed. "They size me up as more stable, which I am. Rather than branding me a boy, with a degree of personality, they're regarding me as an actor of sorts, with signs of ability!" (In fact, Mr. Goldwyn has loaned Joel out twice in recent months—to Columbia for "Adventure in Manhattan", opposite Jean Arthur, and to 20th Century-Fox for "Banjo on My Knee," with Barbara Stanwyck.)

Joel's new wish to excel in his chosen line is decidedly obvious. He raves over such a performer as Paul Muni, for instance, and describes himself, in comparison, as "nothing." He doesn't assume that his future is to be stupendous, but he's bound to make it as noteworthy as he can.

"My bringing-up was advantageous in endowing me with business insight. But I was handicapped for the actual acting. I'd been doused in manners, taught to suppress my reactions. It's no cinch to let yourself go before the cameras and a flock of people!"

While he's wondering how he can tear open his soul, as he swears Muni does, Joel's no longer coddling himself with the notion that he can be a cowboy if his boots are in Hollywood. That was in the back of his head until love brought him the perspective of an adult.

"I could never be a cowboy now," he chuckles. "The McCoy cowboys would never forget that McCrea was in pictures. Anyway, I don't want to switch trades. I'm more intrigued with the movies than ever, and it's taken me seven years to reach the point where acting begins!"

Love, you funny thing! Take a bow for one more very successful transformation.

Harold and Mildred Lloyd step out for an evening's fun. Mildred looks pretty enough to make a screen come-back, doesn't she?

The Trousseau Joan Chose

Joan indulged all her pet fashion fancies in the things she chose for her trousseau. She loves soft, feminine clothes that achieve their effect from color and line rather than from surplus material, draperies, fripperies and such. For evening she prefers long sweeping lines, with frocks that cling through the bodice and waistline, outlining her figure. Just such a gown is the black crepe princess model with the deep square decolletage outlined in the same gold looped beading as that which composes the brief bolero jacket. The beaded border, to both the jacket and the dress, is set with turquoise stones

Another form-fitting and very feminine model is the long-sleeved black crepe restaurant dress which has a scattered patterning of sequins on the slender skirt and hip-length tunic. Although the neckline is high at front, the back is cut out in a deep square. The sleeves have slight fullness above the elbow in a semi-leg o' mutton effect but are tightly fitted to the wrist below. With this, Joan wears a velvet turban with a dashing bow at front. Her fur cape is cross fox.

Joan's favorite color is blue, all shades of it. She chose the charming crepe dinner gown with short sleeves, square neckline and flaring fur peplum because it combined a soft dusty blue with her pet fur, mink. Again you will notice the snug fitting to the bodice and waist with the skirt slightly flared toward the hemline.

SPEAKING of the colors she likes, Joan said, "Brunettes can be as vivid as they like, but when blondes go in for red or vivid green, or other bright, sharp colors, they only succeed in looking hard and cheap. For them, colors must be softened and toned down in order not to give them that glittering look that is most unattractive." Besides blue, she likes the aforementioned dusty rose, golden browns, black or white for evening and occasionally green in the softer tones.

While she wears tailored suits often during the day, she always introduces a frilly blouse or vivid scarf to obtain a feminine effect.

"Though I try to keep tailored things in my daytime wardrobe," she told me, "I revel in the most feminine things at home. My negligees are all of velvet, satin or chiffon."

One of her trousseau negligees, pictured, is of gray chiffon over Nile green. The whole gown is made on graceful, sweeping lines, with full, cape-like sleeves and a train to the skirt. Pink roses cascade from the bodice to the hem in front. Certainly the most bride-like of negligees, isn't it? Another one, not pictured, is a two-piece affair. A white satin robe with a pleated, full-length cape of chiffon.

A favorite daytime ensemble consists of a black wool coat over a mustard yellow silk crepe dress. The coat is cut with classic simplicity, collarless with a flare to the hem which is bordered in cross fox. The silk dress is very simple, too, with a high draped neckline and fitted long sleeves. A high-crowned, brimless black felt hat with a quill placed at a sharp angle makes a perfect topper for this costume. Joan wears a corsage of orchids right at the waist-high closing of her coat. This is not pictured.

Like so many of the Hollywood stars this season, Joan likes the tunic silhouette and has repeated it throughout her trousseau, both in evening and daytime costumes.

"This year, the tunic and peplum lines that are so important happen to be most becoming to me, so I've been able to have them in evening frocks, afternoon clothes and even in tailored suits," she explained.

While she and Dick sailed in a leisurely manner by the canal route, she loved to dance on warm evenings in the romantic black net gown which she had selected for just such purpose. The tremendous fullness of the skirt is achieved by the ingenious use of twelve set in gores, each of which is topped by an appliqued disc of red velvet. The same red velvet is used in crossed bands to define the waistline and the crossed detail is repeated again in the bodice where the net gives the effect. Her shoulders are covered by short, looped sleeves.

A chinchilla muff is the only decoration used to accent Joan's long and quite Victorian looking evening wrap. This wrap is in a beautiful shade of Coronation blue and is doubly stunning when worn over a black crepe dinner gown with shoulder capelets and deep flounce of the same shade of velvet. The flounce is outlined in tiny, hand-embroidered flowers, the same motif repeated on the cape sleeves, where they join the bodice of the dress.

A flower patterning is used again in Joan's trousseau, this time for a gay, puffed sleeved lacquered satin jacket which tops a dull black crepe gown. The pattern is a small flower motif printed in an allover effect.

THIS is only a sample of the lavish trousseau, but it gives you a small idea of what a completely feminine person Joan is. Also it proves that even a busy, popular actress can be as romantic and sentimental about her trousseau as any girl, the country over.

One thing that Joan said, as we parted, that I think is especially worth passing on:

"One of the most important things in being well-dressed, to my way of thinking, is to watch your hose. No matter how expensive the rest of your costume, if your hosiery is not sheer and clear and in the right shade, the entire effect can be ruined. Therefore, I am careful about the shade of hose I wear with each frock, and always, always have hose that are sheer and utterly ringless.

"Also one of the costume rules that I always follow," she continued, "is to have my shoes and bag of the same material and shade, whenever possible and to have my gloves match either my hat or some trimming on the hat, in the latter case the hat itself will match my frock. I do not like gloves and bag to match as I consider the contrast of the glove against the bag most effective."

The same month that Joan and Dick were married, three other prominent Hollywood couples joined the altarward procession—and in each instance the brides wore costumes that were well worth keeping in mind for future reference in case any of you step off between now and June.

Henry Fonda's bride, Mrs. Frances Seymour Brokaw, wore a bouffant taffeta gown with inset circular stripings of tulle. And her hat was an off-the-face model of the same taffeta with a bow as its only trimming. She, like Joan, chose a most appropriate and correct costume for a second marriage.

However, both Maureen O'Sullivan and Ann Sothern had all the fun of a first wedding with veil and the trimmings. Maureen, for her church wedding at high noon to John Farrow, wore the traditional white satin with voluminous tulle veil. Her gown was made with a fitted bodice and flared skirt—she carried gardenias and white orchids.

It took Ann to strike the most unique note of all the brides. Her wedding was most unique, in fact, as the ceremony took place at one minute past midnight. Ann had not planned it that way but both she and Roger Pryor forgot about California's three-day license law and had to postpone the original day and hour until the license could be made legal. Ann's costume was charming—she wore a blue metal cloth gown with fitted bodice, square neckline and short sleeves, the skirt of which was full and floor length. From a tiny Juliet cap of the metal cloth, floated a brief but full tulle veil. You can't imagine a more effective foil for Ann's blonde beauty. She carried huge branched orchids, the stems of which were tightly wrapped in satin ribbon. A stunning costume for you who like to be different and arresting.

whenever she was fortunate enough to rate a call from a casting office. It was director Edmund Goulding who noticed her in a crowd. He was struck by her budding sweetness and foresaw the spark of personality which was to lift her from the rank-and-file. Furthermore, he took the trouble to send her out to the Pathe studio, where they were building up a stock company. Marian's test was satisfactory and she was put under contract.

"By this time I was crazy to act," she recalled. She was smart, besides, for she realized that talkies demanded more than mere prettiness. With rare acumen she went to Nance O'Neil, famous stage star, and arranged to be coached. Miss O'Neil was persuaded to tutor her in how to stand, how to walk and in voice placement. They enacted Shakespearian and modern dramas. Marian was inspired to think of what she could make of herself if she exerted her energy.

By no means has Hollywood been a snap for this astonishingly optimistic girl, however. She's had to fight, not only for recognition, but against bad breaks that would have floored a less spirited person. For instance, Pathe let her go. (They dismissed Carole Lombard and Lew Ayres simultaneously. Only then it was no joke to any one of them!)

Undaunted, Marian scurried about and landed a six-months' contract with Samuel Goldwyn. Of course, she was ready to exercise the technical knowledge which she'd been acquiring by sacrificing luxuries. But she was only asked to deliver a few lines in Eddie Cantor's "Whoopee." Meanwhile, she was still enrolled in public school. Marian blithely studied under the teachers provided on the sets, when she was unable to attend classes. A hectic, dual adolescence, but she thrived on it.

One of the chief things about films Marian has stumbled upon is that there's nothing more deceiving than apparent security. If you tackle Hollywood, don't expect to rest on your laurels because you win a contract. Goldwyn didn't take up her option. But she wasn't sleeping at the switch.

She had engaged a business agent by now. Four days after she was out in the cold, she was at another studio for a test. It was so promising that she was immediately signed on a long-term deal.

"Then for six months I was forgotten. I kept up my coaching with Nance O'Neil; I delved into dancing. Then, finally, I met Edward MacGregor, a stage director. I'd heard he was putting on 'Young Sinners' for a West Coast run and securing the feminine lead would let me show I was worth being cast in a picture. 'How old are you?' Mr. MacGregor demanded when I walked into his office. I countered with 'How old do you suppose!' I sounded surprised at his imagining I could be too young to essay a wild flapper."

THIS youthful confidence captured the part for Marian. Talent, polished by her resolute concentration, emerged to make her a hit in both Los Angeles and San Francisco theatres. She was sixteen, but she had nerve enough to hold her own with veteran performers. And as soon as she finished with the play, Warners assigned her the coveted character of Trilby in John Barrymore's "Svengali."

Everything was grand. She emoted with William Powell and Edward G. Robinson and other greats. Then, at eighteen, she was rewarded with official stardom.

Shortly, there ensued one of those peculiar bad breaks that is apt to ruin you in Hollywood. Through no fault of her own, Marian was bewilderingly disregarded. It seems she had a terribly strenuous program, one lead skimming upon the heels of another. A threat of illness made it necessary for her to go to a hospital and, while she was there, her agent secretly informed her employers that she'd not return to the lot until her small salary was tripled.

This audacity was so infuriating that, when Marian was well again, none of the executives cared to speak to her. When her option came up for renewal it was allowed to lapse. Not until months afterwards did she fathom the riddle.

Gradually the prejudice against her "temperament" faded as she evidenced her natural amiability. But when you once lose momentum it's no cinch to re-arouse Hollywood. She eventually won some leads, and then she accepted foreign offers. She heroined in England and in Germany, mastering sufficient German to speak her dialogue herself. That little feat was accomplished in three weeks, incidentally.

But Marian wanted to regain her place in America. So she came back. Columbia put her under contract and Josef von Sternberg selected her to portray the dramatic Sonya in "Crime and Punishment." She was admirable with Ruth Chatterton in "Lady of Secrets," and "Counterfeit" has helped to make her more of a favorite.

WITH all these troubled episodes behind her, she still isn't the least cynical. "You have to be strong enough to stand the gaff anywhere," she contends, philosophically. "I don't say that I'm grateful for hard knocks. I'm not that noble! But when you get a slam, the alternative that occurs to me is to keep on trying until you have another chance."

When she compares her life with what it would have been if she hadn't become a movie actress, she rejoices at the way fate guided her.

"I certainly wouldn't have travelled, or have been playing leads in Hollywood, London and Berlin when I was twenty—if I hadn't begun when I was young. I'd never have had the opportunity to meet so many noted people. Your interests can't help but broaden here, when you're in contact with visiting celebrities along with local ones."

You can do a little checking on Marian as I have, if you wish. You must concede that she's profited mightily by passing up the ordinary routine for a screen career. Aside from the obvious advantages she has obtained, she's unquestionably enriched herself as a person.

She knows about clothes. Association with smartly dressed women has endowed her with excellent taste. The subtle tricks of charm, which mean so much, are hers. She's habitually attended the outstanding concerts—the Philharmonic Auditorium automatically reserves seats for Marian for every program and she always has a box at the Hollywood Bowl. So her appreciation of music is definitely above average.

"Experience isn't detrimental to a girl," she vows. "It's a tremendous asset. You must encounter unanticipated things and be strong enough to conquer the dilemmas—to gain real poise. And if you handle your personal conduct rightly you won't have to fret about a career's temptations. Men judge you as you wish to be judged.

"I've never had any 'puppy-love' affairs. You'll be thrown with older men if you head for Hollywood. But they're not ogres. Indeed, they're more exciting because they've been places and are doers as well as dreamers.

"Your dates will be for dining and dancing at glamorous spots. Perfect orchestras, attentive beaux, and the feel of being in the midst of a gala week-end party that never ends. What could be more fun?

"Since I haven't been to college I can merely draw conclusions as to what I've missed. I don't want to sound presumptuous, but the only loss I can think of is that I've worked too steadily to have time for many girl friends. They're nice to have, I'm sure.

"Actual acting is far more valuable than theoretical study of the drama; chumming with those who are constantly accomplishing is more beneficial than reading about the prominent."

You can click in Hollywood if you have as much ability, astuteness and spunk as this girl. I suggest that you induce your family to come with you, however. Marian has always had her home to return to at the end of her adventuring out into the movie world. And she appreciates it. What wisdom there is in this extraordinary young lady!

to another company, Bob returned to M-G-M with fresh honors under his belt, or on his lapel or wherever an actor wears fresh honors.

Now the acting business, in case you don't know, is a business in which the participants are never satisfied. If the story is all right, the director is terrible. And if the director is all right, the actor's role is impossible. If an actor gets a contract, which he has been pining for, he no more than signs it than he wishes he were free-lancing. Nothing is ever perfect in this profession. It seems to be a part of the game for an actor to spend about half his energy complaining about the hardness of his lot.

Here was Bob, with just cause for complaint, it would seem, never saying a word. He just plugged along. And then he was sent to England to make a picture with Jessie Matthews. He was so good in that picture—"It's Love Again"—that they wanted him for another and promised to send Miss Matthews to Hollywood to make a picture in exchange if he would only make "Secret Agent" with Madeleine Carroll. He made the extra picture, to the delight of audiences, his stock soared and he returned to his home studio. And what do you think happened then? You'd never guess, but he was put right into another B-picture. In fact, a couple of them.

Then something happened to make Bob the envy of every young actor in Hollywood. He was given his choice between working with Lily Pons in her current picture, or playing the male lead in "Stowaway" with Shirley Temple.

Now put yourself in Bob's place. What would you do if you had to choose between Lily and Shirley? It is likely you would be in as much of a quandary as Bob was.

"Here I was, in a position I'd wanted to be in all my life," Bob confessed to me, "and I almost collapsed. I read both scripts and the role in 'Stowaway' seemed to offer me more than the other one. However, there were other considerations that made the Lily Pons picture very inviting. I couldn't sleep nights. I paced the floor. I couldn't make up my mind. And then I said to myself: 'Look here, you've got to decide sometime. You'll either be right or wrong.' So I decided on 'Stowaway.' Everyone tells me I decided on the wrong picture, so I think it must be the right one. Anyway I'm very pleased about the whole thing.

"There's one thing about a Shirley Temple picture," he added, "and that is that everybody sees it."

Robert Young is often spoken of as being "normal," a description that fits few actors, for, as one said to me recently, "no one expects or wants an actor to be normal." But applied to Bob, the speaker usually means that he has kept his balance. It wouldn't have surprised me if Bob had said it was all nonsense not to be normal in Hollywood, but he didn't.

"I used to think that," he said seriously. "Before I was married and even for a while afterward I thought that Hollywood was just a place like any other place; that it was up to the individual to keep his balance, but now I don't think it is so easy.

"In the first place," he continued, "before I got my job in pictures, I worked for a stock broker for $100 a month. My first job in pictures paid me $100 a week. Immediately everything was on a different basis. I don't mean that I changed or forgot my old friends or anything like that, but naturally you do things a little differently, live a little better, have more and better clothes and do more things when your salary is increased to four times its former amount.

"I haven't changed my friends, however. I have kept all my old school pals. I do that for two reasons. One is that I like them and the other is that associating with people who do live normal lives helps me to keep my balance."

Then he told of an evening recently when he and his wife took a young married couple out to celebrate the wife's birthday.

"WE went to a night club," Bob continued, "where all the actors meet and talk about themselves. I was prepared for a typical night at a cafe, but these friends of ours were so thrilled to be there, to see the stars and noted people that I found myself sharing their enthusiasm. I began to see the place through their eyes instead of these bored eyes of mine.

"Another thing that makes it easier for my wife and me to remain normal and avoid a lot of pitfalls that get in front of some of our friends, is that we have known each other for such a long time. We were friends for years and sweethearts all through school. But this business does offer a lot of handicaps that working in a bank doesn't. However, it is more or less up to the individual, and with all its drawbacks the picture business offers a lot of compensations.

"I'm grateful for all the opportunities it has given me—for my home, the comforts, the good times and the knowledge that I will be able to give my child a good education. And there's one I'll be eternally grateful for, the opportunity of meeting and knowing Lewis Stone. His friendship has meant a lot to me.

"You know, a fellow can be a great actor and an awful heel at the same time," Bob expounded. "Lewis Stone is a great actor and a fine gentleman. No matter what happens, he ignores it all. He refuses to let anything upset him. All the petty annoyances and even the big problems go over his head like water over a duck's back. And when his work is done and he can get out on his yacht, he is king of all he surveys. He puts the studio entirely out of his mind and is just Lew Stone. I've learned a lot from my association with him."

Choosing for a pal a man old enough to be his father, isn't the routine generally followed by the aspiring young actor. But that is just one of Hollywood's set rules that Bob makes a habit of breaking. In a town where "you must entertain the right people—the ones who can help you along—"; where "you must be seen at this or that popular cafe or night club," Bob goes merrily on his way doing what he thinks best. One of the items on the "must" list for an actor is to have a business manager to handle his money in addition to an agent who gets him jobs.

"But why should I have a business manager?" Bob demanded. "I think it's silly. I can't save money, so I put a certain amount of my salary in the bank every week and when that's gone, that's all there is. If I overdraw, the bank gives me hell and I have to make it up the next week. The rest of my salary I put into insurance and annuities. It doesn't require any master mind to do that."

IT sounds almost too good to be true, but Bob has retained his perspective in a town where perspectives are all out of step. He is even eager to work more than he does—even in B-pictures—because he figures that every role he plays teaches him something about his work and prepares him for a future regarding which he has a plan.

"You see," he said earnestly, in discussing his plan, "I'm almost twenty-nine years old. In five years I'll be close to thirty-five which, if you stop and think, is the age of most of the really important male stars in pictures. Outside of Bob Taylor and a few others, of course," he added.

"I've been in pictures about ten years and I hope I've been learning all that time, but I'm not ready to be a star yet. If I keep on going as I am now; if I work hard and get to be a really good actor, a competent, versatile actor, why, when that big part that every actor hopes for, comes, I'll be ready for it. I'm studying music now. Not because I'm a musician crying to express myself or because I think I have any great voice, but because that will be one more tool for me to use in my business.

"I'm grateful that my career has gone along in a smooth, steady way; that I haven't been pushed into stardom before I was ready for it. Sometimes those meteoric rises to stardom have a fall that is just as rapid and spectacular.

"I've been very lucky," he confessed. "I haven't had to suffer for my art. I didn't even struggle to get into this business. I was pushed into it."

And then he told me how he had a job with a stock broker and a friend suggested he join the Pasadena Community Players.

"Well, that was fun," he declared enthusiastically. "I enjoyed it. Of course, I learned a lot over there, but it was fun doing it. I would have been out dancing or going to the movies if I hadn't been rehearsing every night. A fellow has to go some place. But I wasn't suffering or making any sacrifices."

If Bob only knew what he was missing by not suffering for his art, suffering being one of the most satisfactory compensations derived from the business of acting. But even without suffering, someone with vision saw this handsome boy playing minor roles on the stage and he was given an M-G-M contract and has been with that company ever since.

Of course, no one is perfect and Bob has one bad fault. He is an inveterate knocker. On one subject he has nothing much good to say and, strangely enough, the object of his vigorous attacks is Bob Young!

"I'm a 'putter-offer,'" he declared solemnly. "Honestly, no matter how badly I want to do a thing, I never get around to it."

Despite my arguments in his behalf, he went ahead, determined to convince me that he is dilatory; that he doesn't take advantage of opportunities and that mañana is his favorite word.

I NEVER would have applied for a job in pictures. I might have wanted to ever so much, but I never would have gotten around to it. I plan things to do, all right, but I don't seem to get to them.

"Here's one example," he continued. "We wanted a dog to raise with the baby. Our friends offered us dogs of various breeds, sizes and ages, but we never accepted one simply because I couldn't decide which one to accept. Six months went by and then one day our cook returned from a vacation with a little mutt dog under her arm.

"The vet I took him to told me that there was a dog that could look almost any dog in the eye and call him 'brother' without being wrong more than once out of ten times, and the only strain in him that he could positively recognize was Maltese Terrier. Being twice the size a Maltese Terrier should be, the assumption is that his parents 'got around' some. But he is cute and we kept him and now are as attached to him as we could be to the finest dog in the land. But you see, if the cook hadn't taken matters into her own hands, we probably wouldn't have a dog yet.

"I get twelve weeks off every year," he went on. "Often between pictures I'm off for a few days or a week. And twelve weeks of vacation is more than a bank clerk gets. I have loads of time to do things—like studying languages, reading good books, doing things to improve myself—but I don't do them. Everyone should have a hobby, but I haven't. I play tennis and play with the baby and fool around, reading whatever is at hand instead of choosing good books, and the first thing I know I have to get started on a picture."

He may not choose good books, but one thing he does read is the criticisms of his work. And when I caught him nodding his head and muttering: "That's right. I did do that," I supposed it must be a very flattering review. On the contrary, this particular reviewer had gone after Bob hammer and tongs.

"He's right, too," Bob declared. "I see what he means, and I won't make that mistake again."

Sometimes Bob is late for an appointment and it is invariably because he has become engrossed in a book or magazine. And often, as he starts out his front door he will stop, stoop over and read an entire issue of some advertising publication that has been thrown onto his front porch. Can you imagine the handsome young actor, his head almost touching the floor, his posterior in an exalted position, reading avidly the bargains offered by Hollywood merchants?

"I guess there's just one way to break me of that habit," he said with an engaging grin, "and that is for someone to sneak up and pin a sign on my back—a sign that reads: 'Kick me.'"

He heretofore has been quite successful in living this freedom. Now, success enters to play the role of heavy. Following "The Song of Songs" with Marlene Dietrich, "The Constant Nymph," "What Every Woman Knows" with Helen Hayes, and "Glitter" with Joan Crawford, Brian found himself a prime favorite with the fans.

There was one producer in Hollywood who knew he was a prime favorite and wanted to star him in pictures. That was Irving Thalberg. BUT—Mr. Thalberg didn't want to cast Brian in big productions unless he was willing to stick close to Hollywood, sign a 52-week a year contract, and devote all his time to the movies. Mr. Thalberg, being happily married to Norma Shearer, and also knowing the zest that romance puts in life—real or reel—had a solution to Brian's dilemma but that young man merely chuckled over it and let it go for a chuckle. But this is the idea and this is the way it developed.

One day on the M-G-M lot, Brian was in Irving Thalberg's office, talking career and pictures. Mr. Thalberg interrupted the conference to pick up the telephone and call his home. Mrs. Thalberg, otherwise the beauteous Norma Shearer, answered the call.

"Norma," Irving began, "I've got Brian in my office."

Norma waited.

"I still can't induce him to devote all his time to pictures," Irving continued.

Still Norma waited.

"But I've got an idea," Irving came to the point. "What Brian needs is to fall in love, get married, and settle down in Hollywood."

Norma considered the idea box-office—domestically and professionally.

"We'll have to find the girl for him," Irving ended.

Norma was diplomatic. Finding the girl was something else again. It still is, for Mr. Aherne doesn't discuss his personal affairs other than to say, under cross-examination, that he is not married; he never has been married; he never has wanted to marry; and it doesn't appear at the moment that he is going to think differently, being as free from the thought as ever before in his thirty odd years.

"There's the difficulty," he admitted. "If I don't sign up on a yearly basis to make pictures, it appears I shan't get the parts that I really enjoy playing. On the other hand," perplexedly, "I love the theatre. I've been in it all my life, but now there seems to be a difficulty with that, too—and also because of pictures."

"For instance?" I encouraged.

"Well, there was my part as the English lord in Katherine Cornell's play, 'St. Joan.' It was a beautiful role and I was very enthusiastic about it. But while we were on the road with the play, I received a number of letters from people who saw it saying they didn't care for me at all in such a disagreeable part."

AND it was a decidedly disagreeable part that Mr. Aherne enacted. He was the dastardly Britisher who, for reasons of political gain, sent the heroic Joan of Arc to the stake to be burned. Furthermore, he wore costume and a bit of a beard. And those who have seen him act pleasant roles in pictures, didn't share his pleasure in such a disguised, despicable stage role, no matter what he may think or feel about it. These same frank dissenters were the people who, liking his work in the talkies, have brought him to the threshold of stardom—provided he will yield to the way the producers want him to live, and work.

"What do you think you'll do?" I asked.

He shook his head indecisively and puffed at the pipe which, having gone out, he re-lit, flipping the match into the fireplace. "I don't know. I don't take to the idea at all of settling down in one place."

Apparently, he never has settled. He has played on the stage in London and he has made pictures in England. He has a charming little cottage down in the English countryside, which is the nearest thing to being settled he has ever managed. He has played in Australia and spent enough time on a sheep ranch there to get a taste of Australia in the rough.

"I enjoyed it," he commented. "The ranch was miles from the railroad station and there were no neighbors for miles about. I did a little riding around the place with the men—most interesting. We took a supply of tea and sugar and then started out to see that the fences were intact and the sheep safe. The trip takes days, for the ranches in that country are simply enormous. When it was time to eat, the chap took a bit of tea, put it in a pot of water, dug a hole in the ground, built a fire over the pot. Then he caught a sheep, skinned it, and roasted it over the fire. Tea and mutton got done together. Then we dined. It's a quiet life and a sane sort of life, but it grows on you as does the country."

"It sounds like a place to stretch," I remarked.

He half-smiled, nodding. "It is—with plenty of sky and stars to help."

"But there's still Hollywood," I returned to the main issue. "Do you agree with the producers that you should give up your life to pictures?"

"I'm afraid I see their side of it pretty strongly," he admitted. "After all, you know, they do put a great deal of money into their pictures and, if they build a player to stardom, they're entitled to get their investment in the player back in his stardom."

"Then if you agree with them you'll sign up for a year?"

"I don't know," he said.

"Do you like Hollywood? Because if you don't—"

"I do like it," he interposed quickly. "I can't say I altogether understand it, but I like it. I was told the first time I went out I wouldn't be able to wait to get back to New York. The second time, I'd think of coming back to see the shows. And the third time," he smiled, "well, the third time I'd close up my New York apartment and move out bag and baggage. But I don't know that I've reached the third stage yet."

"Couldn't you still have the freedom you enjoy and live in Hollywood?"

"I've never been tied down," he moved restively. "I've done what plays I've wanted to do. I've traveled when I've wanted. And I've made pictures when I've liked the parts."

"Then why not make the producers come around to your way of thinking," I suggested brashly.

"They apparently won't," he deplored, and added, amused at his own predicament,

"I really don't know how to make up my mind. Money is good to have. One has obligations, you know. But so is freedom."

"And Mr. Thalberg's idea—romance?"

"I'm not in love," he answered briefly.

WHICH, in a way, if one be romantically inclined, seems a pity. For Brian Aherne is a most attractive young Englishman. He is rather a shy young man who, in appearance, reminds me vaguely of a youthful edition of Percy Marmont. He is six feet three, leanly built, with light brown hair and blue eyes. He feels most uncomfortable talking of himself and, as a matter of fact, is decidedly wary of granting interviews. There is a clause in his contract saying that he has to see only two interviewers a year, so my being one of the two is perhaps in the nature of a feat. He has an older brother named Patrick, who was a star in the silent days of pictures in England. Patrick is very happily married and has several children. He has a sister, Elena, who was on the stage but gave it up to open an antique shop in London.

Brian has no pet ambition, other than to act parts that he enjoys and avoiding, when possible, playing just so-so hero roles opposite well-known women stars. He considers himself a decidedly hopeless subject to be interviewed. That he enjoys golf, swimming, and motoring; that he has a valet who travels with him and takes care of him and whatever his home happens to be—house, apartment, or hotel suite; that he imbibes tea at four o'clock regularly; that he doesn't care for large parties or slews of people or night clubs and such obvious glitter seems of no consequence to him and, being so very personal, he can't see how it would interest anyone. He is interested in travel films, though the idea of making any himself doesn't stir him to any other than casual interest. He is very fond of his country place in England and cheerfully proud of it. He has traveled much in England, on the Continent, and in this country.

He is neither happy nor unhappy but has a decided capacity to be either. He is very much the bachelor type, which combines a liking for and an impatience with the loneliness of that state and the idea of ever giving it up. He dreams a good deal, but has the fortunate—or unfortunate—knack of so clearly seeing another person's viewpoint that on occasion it interferes with his own decisiveness.

Which is where we met Brian Aherne and his problem—money or freedom. With freedom he will have money, to be sure, but not the potfuls of gold that Hollywood showers on its favorites. And being acutely aware of the value of money in these days of not so much of it, he hesitates to decide his problem lest haste make for repentance and difficulties. He doesn't usually hesitate in making decisions, and the fact he is doing so now contributes to his unrest. Life has suddenly been transformed for him into a big question-mark and a question-mark isn't the simplest of obstacles. Particularly when one answer brings the pot of gold and the other—well, the life of the free-lance can be champagne or soda-water. And champagne is much cozier than soda-water.

As you read this story, Mr. Aherne is again back in Hollywood, having just finished "Beloved Enemy" with lovely Merle Oberon and this trip may tell the tale: money or freedom.

Handsome Is As Make-up Does

of your mouth. If you use an indelible stick, don't apply fresh lipstick over old. Remove the old first.

WE hear a great deal about following the natural shape of the mouth. Generally speaking, this is excellent advice. But if you have a very bad mouth, there's no law against experimenting with a few alterations. A liquid powder—very, very carefully used—can blot out to a great extent the natural outline of your mouth, and then you can draw on your own lips, following as much as possible the natural shape and just fixing things up a little where you feel it's necessary. I say you must experiment with this, and once you discover a trick that works, stick to it. If you wish to enlarge a thin mouth a little, do it at the outer curve of the upper lip—not at the bow. Just a tiny bit. Again generally speaking, I'd say it's okay to make a too-small mouth look a little bigger, but a bad idea to try to make a big mouth look smaller. Big mouths are nice and generous and they happen to be fashionable.

The above two paragraphs go for all types. I can't talk about lipstick all day, so . . .

2. I have said, for daytime, the young, natural, wholesome type should do with a minimum of make-up, and often lipstick will fill the bill. But not always. The next most important accent to the face, after the mouth, is the eye. If your lashes are light and dopey looking, use mascara. Brown, not black, for daytime, even though your general coloring is more brunette than otherwise. Just tip the lashes with the brush, very lightly, and then after the goo dries, brush your lashes out with a fresh dry brush. The same advice goes for eyebrows. Don't draw the brows out beyond their natural length, either. Instead of mascara, you may find that a soft brown pencil, feathered across your lashes and brows, will give the desired effect. Or perhaps one of the good eyelash growers, which are brown in color. Kill two birds with one stone, you see—doll up your eyes and "grow" your lashes at the same time. I've been asked if one can really and truly make lashes grow. M. M. will tell you the truth: they will grow a smitch—maybe a sixteenth of an inch in length—with long, faithful application of lash-grower or vaseline. They will grow materially thicker, however, if you keep after them. And that ain't all: the application of grower or vaseline gives them body and life and sometimes a tendency to curl upward, which makes 'em look longer and thicker than they really are. Now are you satisfied?

Don't use any other eye make-up tricks in the daytime except the above.

I guess I don't need to tell you that if your face shines like a beacon without powder, use powder. A very slightly darker shade than your own skin. Get after that excessive shine with a mild astringent tonic and cut out fats and sweets from your diet for a spell. You should, of course, use rouge if you look terrible without it. Cream rouge for normal and dry skins. Cake rouge for oily skins. Very little.

3. Here are some stunts that this type of girl may do for gala occasions—for evening.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE . . .

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

rub. There's something about this trick which kind of "sets" the powder for the evening. You should experiment, first, of course.

Try using two different shades of powder—in other words, highlight your face with powder. You might use a darker shade on your nose, if you consider it a little too prominent. If your face has a tendency to hollow in, like Dietrich's, at the sides—which is werry, werry fascinating—blend a darker shade of powder into these hollows. Under soft lights, the two shades won't be obvious.

Do some one thing—just one—that will make you look entirely different from your daytime appearance. If you go without mascara most of the time, use it for a party. I know a blonde whose lashes are thick but light. She darkened them quite a lot for one party and wondered why she had suddenly become so popular. Blue mascara for blue-eyed misses is swell. But stay away from the more exotic shades of eyeshadow, you young people; such goings-on are for older girls.

A change of hair-do can make a striking change in a girl for a party. Do the opposite of what you do in the daytime: wear it rather slick and severe, if your customary coiffeur is soft and loose, or vice versa. Refrain, though, you young people, from complicated, "fixy" hair-does, and these ultra-sophisticated hair-ornaments which are the rage just now.

AND now a word to really pretty girls, which brings up Loretta Young as a case in point. Loretta isn't a strict, authentic beauty, because of her big mouth, but she's close to it. She's not striking—like Kay Francis, for example—nor unusual, like Garbo, say. She's just unusually pretty. There's a softness, a passiveness, an ultra-femininity about her. There are thousands of attractive girls in this country, just as pretty in their way as Loretta is in hers. I wish they'd be content to let well enough alone. I wish they'd be content to stay pretty, and not try to be sophisticated types, exotic types, what-have-you types. I wish they'd keep their skins nice, by sensible diet and regular care, and let their make-up go at a touch of powder on the nose and a touch of soft-colored lipstick, perhaps. I wish they'd leave their eyebrows the natural shape, with only the merest bit of grooming for tidiness' sake. I wish the pretty girls with the soft brown hair—like Loretta's—would let it remain soft brown and not go bleaching and henna-ing it. Being pretty to start with, so many young kids think they can turn themselves into all-time wows by using a whole lot of make-up and going in for hair-dye. They end up looking tough and hard-boiled.

For this type, soft colors are the thing. Off-shades of rose and blue. Warm, not hard, bright, shades of red. Grey-green, golden-brown, violet-blue—the more feminine, alluring shades. Soft, feminine lines, too. Not too strictly tailored. Not too clinging to hip and buzzoom. Suggesting, rather than revealing all the lines of the figure.

Irene Dunne may use every kind of make-up on the market. I don't happen to know just what Miss Dunne uses, but she could give her face the works, if she desired. Whatever this screen favorite puts on her face, she puts on with the best of taste and the greatest of care. That's one object lesson we'll draw from Irene: good taste, a ladylike appearance under all circumstances. The word ladylike has sort of gone out of fashion, but M.M. thinks it's still a pretty fine word. The other object lesson we'll draw from Irene is this: being a more or less average type (with all due respect to her) and having advanced beyond the young-girl age, she can do what she pleases to her face and hair, how she pleases and when she pleases. Betcha I could take any number of girls in the late twenties and early thirties who are kind of drab—neither good-looking nor bad-looking—and make them as attractive and smart as Irene Dunne. Here's how I'd go about it:

Pinning the hair firmly back from the face and binding a towel around the locks, I'd thoroughly cold-cream said face—remove every trace of make-up from it—and see what Nature had given us to start with. Let's say the eyebrows are too close together. All right—we'll cheat on Nature a little by plucking them an eighth to a quarter of an inch away from the nose. That sets the eyes wider apart, right off. Then we'll shadow the lids, at the outer corners—out and up, toward the temples. This will be done before any powder or anything else is applied, for it's going to be our daytime make-up and we don't want the shadow to be obvious. A brown cream shadow is the best choice.

Let's say the face is too narrow. We'll put the rouge far out on the cheeks. If the face is too wide, it will go closer to the nose. If it's too heavy in the lower part, we'll put shadows of rouge low down to make the face look thinner. We'll use a medium shade of cream rouge and blend it in like crazy so that no line of demarcation shows.

LET'S try one of the liquid powder foundations over this and see what the effect is. These foundations give a mat-like, dull finish to the friendly old face. Or let's try that semi-liquid make-up that so many of the girls are using instead of powder when they want their faces to stay made-up from seven a.m. to five p.m. It takes a little practice to get these liquids and semi-liquids on without blotching. Don't forget your neck when you're applying powder, liquid or ordinary. But to get on with our work . . .

Let's say we want to use regular powder—the powder that comes in the bottle gives a "too made-up look" for daytime. It would be fine for evening. Press powder on, don't rub it into your skin. Press on an excess quantity and then remove the excess with a bit of clean cotton or a powder brush. You'll have to write me about shades—I can't go into all of that here.

Well, there we are with our eyes shadowed and whatever rouge is necessary and a careful workman-like coat of powder on. Then we'll take a little cream or oil and remove the powder from the eyebrows and eyelashes, brushing them afterwards with a tiny brush kept just for this purpose. How do we look? Do we still need mascara? Or are the results good enough for daytime, plus a dash of good, bright lipstick? Remember, our aim is good taste, we don't want to look too theatrical. If possible, save the mascara for evening, when you may use as much of it as you like. Also for evening, there are shades of eyeshadow like you never heard tell about—gold, bronze, green-gold. Very sophisticated, but the girl we're talking about can get away with them, if she'll keep on exercising the all important good taste. In other words, she may use whatever she likes in the way of cosmetics—the maddest shades of eyeshadow, the wildest reds for her lipstick. But she uses a little—she blends everything in carefully. There are no blobs of color, no hard lines where rouge leaves off and pale skin begins.

Well, and now there's Katie Hepburn, who is no beauty in any language, but who has turned her plain, angular face into a distinguished, interesting face. She's an inspiration to plain women—to downright ugly women. If you can't be pretty, be different. How? Well, there, my children, you'll have to write me for personal information and send me your "pitcher" if possible. One of Hepburn's tricks of individuality is her mouth make-up, which I happen not to like, but it is different. She has little shape to her upper lip and she makes it up straight across, and gives it shape by a trick of lifting it when she talks. Her eyebrows are short, rather thick and blunt, and she leaves them so, refusing to draw them out to the usual exotic Hollywood length.

The exquisite modelling of Garbo's face comes under the head of authentic beauty, but there's many a plain woman who might give her face arresting distinction by adapting Garbo's eye make-up to every-day living. A line is drawn, with a black or brown pencil, far up on the eyelids, Close your eyes and run your finger over your lid, way up into the eyesocket. That's where the line goes. When your eyes are open, the effect of this line is evident, more than the line itself. For off-screen purposes, of course, this line should be blended and blurred a little. It gives that heavy-lidded look. It wouldn't suit everybody, naturally, but it's worth experimenting with. At the outer corner of Garbos' eyes, a tiny triangle of black is placed, to give that mournful, droopy look. Again, blend and blur. Such goings-on plus a touch of mascara and perhaps a little artificial shaping and lengthening of the brows, can add glamor and interest to even a plain face.

Well, girls, upon reading this article over, I'm scared to death. I tremble to think of the results, when, as and if some of you put one or two of the screwier stunts detailed herein into effect. But, on second thought, I really don't tremble so much after all. I'm sure you'll take the general advice here for every-day use, and leave the more high-falutin' things for special occasions. Be sensible about make-up and use your judgment about it. Moderation in all things is still a good rule. Your friend, M.M., is eager to answer personal questions from any of you. I don't answer questions in the magazine—your letters to me are treated as "poissonal" and private correspondence. Be patient if the answer seems a long time in coming—I try to give you a thorough answer, even though tardy. The address is Mary Marshall, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. Making the Grade

Now, how can you resist such unabridged candidness as that?

"We have to be at it until midnight," she declared as we settled at our table. "And it's so warm there on the set I'm not hungry." She glanced at the menu and continued, "Says she, ordering a steak!" (Only she chose a vegetable plate and coffee.)

I BEGGED her to go into her story—she did. And here 'tis, in her own words. I think you'll agree it's a pip.

"I was born in Bridgeport, Connecticut, where my father edited the Bridgeport Herald. We moved to New York City, but it didn't make much difference because I was attending convents. I went to three, and at last to New Rochelle College.

"I'm crazy about dancing. Week-ends, when I was home, I had all the Saturday night dates I could. Saturday, day-times, I took dancing lessons from Jack Donohue. That was a bright idea! You see, this whole Hollywood wind-up's probably the result. I remember I was seventeen when I got my first job.

"It seems one of my best boy-friends was at Washington and Lee University, in Virginia, and I decided to go down there for their final dance of the year. So I departed from my campus quite unceremoniously. I wired my mother—after I was on the train.

"Well, that was fun. When I got back to New York, mother met me at the Pennsylvania station with fresh clothes. She said, 'If you're ever planning to get through college you'll have to hurry to New Rochelle for your eyes.' So we dashed to the Grand Central station and with a kiss and a skip I headed for my train.

"Only I had another brilliant brainstorm a second before I got to the gate. My very best boy-friend was graduating from West Point that week and I'd certainly promised to be on hand for all the excitement. You know all the fuss there is, all the grand parading. I was dying to go to that ball, too. Besides, we were in love!

"Fortunately, I had a round-trip ticket to West Point in my purse. I had my evening gown that I'd taken South, and the fresh outfit in which to arrive in a blaze of glory. Also, twenty-five cents in cash in case of emergency. So naturally I switched destinations.

"It was a marvelous week! Of course, we were to have eloped. But we quarreled—got dramatic. Anyway, he was so much older—twenty-seven.

"I arrived home on a Sunday evening and Monday morning I went shopping. Who should I bump into but Jack Donohue's business manager? When he found I was out of school he said, 'Too bad we didn't know that before. Jack's sending a troupe to a leather fair in Boston at five o'clock this afternoon. We could have used you.' I scooted to Mr. Donohue's studio as fast as I could scoot and insisted I could learn the chair-dance tap routine then and there. I did, in a couple of hours. I phoned mother what I was up to, and she stated that she supposed it would be all right—evidently my mind was made up!

"She sent the maid down with some clothes for me and I took the night boat. Our dancing was on for three days, but Jack Donohue thought we were good enough to become a vaudeville act. We lasted at that three weeks, closing in Freeport, on Long Island.

I WASN'T home long until I was invited to a party. Who should be at it but Jimmy Durante and his partners, Clayton and Jackson. Young Mr. Clayton, who was nineteen and so more my type, was positive I had talent. The three of them were opening in a week at Les Ambassadeurs, an exclusive night club. Mr. Clayton told me to call him as he was sure I could acquire the hang of some of the routines. I never did have all those steps pat, but I got by somehow.

"That was swell. But I soon was fired. And here's a queer twist of fate, too. Al Seagal, who's the assistant dance director on this picture I'm doing now, was the man whose duty it was to give me the air! What for? Well, there was a Yale-Dartmouth football game and I went to it with a particularly handsome Dartmouth grad. The trouble was that we were having such a fine time I didn't bother to get to the club until two A.M.

Believe it or not, Roz Russell wore this "boots and saddles" get-up to the tennis matches! Looks kinda swell, doesn't she?

"I wasn't any loss to them. But Jimmy Durante felt sorry for me. Shows what pull will do—he knew the Silver Slipper was opening a new revue in a few nights and he got me in there. At the dress rehearsal they were instructing us about the finale and I was so green I didn't even understand such a technical term. I stepped out of line and inquired blandly, 'What the heck's a finale?' Everyone screamed, seeing I was perfectly serious. It struck them so funny they introduced that crack as my speech in the performance!

"Harry Carroll was at the club one evening and he asked me if I wanted to do a buck-and-wing specialty in Ruth Selwyn's '9:15 Revue.' That meant doubling in two places. But the strain didn't hurt me, for the Selwyn production folded in six weeks. After the fourth, when we were in Chicago, I left because I had an offer to join the second 'Little Show.'

"Mr. William LeBaron caught the revue and offered me a film test. I wasn't interested. By then I had the hunch that I was a genuine smarty. And I was satisfied with what I was doing. When the show closed, however, Mr. LeBaron wired his New York office to try me again. I decided I might as well take the test, so I did. That was on December 22nd. They informed me I registered and was to leave three days after Christmas. I landed here in Hollywood on New Year's Eve.

"I didn't know a soul and I was scared stiff. But I'd been fairly popular in the East, so I was ready to climb on the local bandwagon.

"My first week in Hollywood I was entertained continuously. Then I was assigned a role. But, since I wasn't to start for another week, I went to the beach every day to acquire a modish tan. I did such a keen job that after the first day's shooting I was out of the film. I was too dark. When I faded out I was prepared to try once more."

There Arline Judge hesitated for breath. You've read most of the rest in brief news dispatches from Hollywood. She began with leads and her beguiling pertness has caused her to be in constant demand. At present pert Arline is considered one of our ablest comediennes.

But screen success isn't all Hollywood has given her.

DURING the making of "Are These Our Children?" Wesley Ruggles, who was directing, fell madly in love with her. He sensed her splendid acting possibilities, also, and encouraged her when she wondered if she could deliver in the complex business in which she discovered herself. She realized that she loved Wes far more than she'd fancied she had adored those adolescent heroes back East.

So, within a year after jumping into the greatest adventure a modern girl can experience—going into pictures—Arline had a thriving career and a husband who was ace-high. She moved into a huge house, and shortly she had a son. Because she is so social minded she's become a popular hostess and her good humor makes her an ideal guest.

Perhaps all this luck tempted the gods. At any rate, last spring Arline and Wes separated. It was an excellent opportunity for the gossips to swing into action.

"I like people," Arline was telling me over her second cup of coffee, "and I like them to like me. When Wes and I disagreed I stayed home alone for three weeks. I knew that whomever I'd be seen with would be blamed for breaking up our marriage. Then I—well, you recall the song 'Painting the Town with a Broken Heart'? That was my impulse. I took ill and was in the hospital for a month. I phoned Wes from there and asked him if he'd go home and watch over the baby. He's stayed on.

"I've been swamped with writers' requests for 'the inside' on my personal problem. I haven't given a single interview about it, and I shan't."

"Has this made you more serious?" I interposed.

"Certainly," she replied. "When you have a child you stop being so impetuous. When you've a home to supervise you have responsibility thrust upon you. When you find that you actually have a spot with the movie public you're grateful for it, and want to hang onto it. Because I choose to go out when I'm blue is no indication that I'm taking things casually. That's what the gossips say. They don't know that there have been times when I'd have broken into tears in the middle of the Trocadero if anyone had cried, 'Boo!'"

The director left the restaurant and that was a sign Arline's free hour was up. I helped James assist her into her limousine. "I hope you got a story," she remarked, suddenly and surprisingly wistful.

Season Tickets for Movies?

Why not a season ticket for movie audiences? I think this would be a great inducement to those who are not frequent attendants and so do not know which picture they would care to see, and so often end up by not going at all.

Season tickets could be sold for a month or more, and, with a slight saving on the "strip," the "regulars" could revel in seeing a favorite show twice, while the uninitiated, who were doubtful about the kind of show to visit, would feel they might risk a ticket. On the assumption that we all love a bargain, I feel sure that season tickets would be a great success, and bring many a new fan to the flickers.—Connie Cowell, Vancouver, B. C., Canada.

Christmas at the Lloyds

with a plunge in the outdoor swimming pool! Quite a California finale, is it not?

But within the house itself, Christmas is observed along more traditional lines in an atmosphere that is essentially friendly, simple and homey despite the grandeur of the surroundings. That can be explained, doubtless, by the fact that the Lloyds are really "family people" with a keen liking for gay and informal entertaining at their own fireside and with a firm determination to make their place a real home for their children.

"We make the greatest fuss possible over every single holiday, even the less important ones," said Mrs. Lloyd, seated opposite me in the lovely French-style music room with its white baby grand piano and delicate flower-painted ceiling. The three children, Gloria who is 12, Peggy, 11, and Harold Jr., 5, sprawled out comfortably on the pale rose rug, seemed fully as interested in their Mother's remarks as I. And why not? Weren't we going to talk about Christmas? So they were all ears as she continued.

FIRST, of course, we decorate every single room with holly and mistletoe—while the children's playhouse comes in for special attention. We have a simply huge tree in the living-room with smaller trees in several of the other rooms. The last mentioned are for decorative purposes only, since all the gifts are placed under the big tree. We collect all our relatives and some of our closest friends and make it a gala occasion. On Christmas Eve we all hang up our stockings in front of the fireplace—papa, mamma and visitors as well as the children.

"Then, in the morning, after Santa Claus has paid us a visit, we explore the contents of the stockings and open our presents," she went on with an affectionate glance at young Harold whose eyes were fairly popping with excitement. "We sing carols and play games and after dinner spend the day in quiet recreations around the house and in the gardens. It is strictly a family day with us, you see. On New Year's day we keep open house with guests beyond number dropping in casually; but Christmas day is devoted to the children, with their happiness and enjoyment uppermost in our minds.

"And now for Christmas dinner and holiday refreshments in general," Mildred Lloyd continued, warming to her subject as she noted with what keen interest and obvious pleasure I was taking down notes of all the things she was telling me.

"Our dinner table decorations provide us with a touch of the 'white Christmas' idea which is so popularly accepted as the thing to have. In the center of the table we have a long mirror—that's supposed to be ice, you know, and it's surface is dotted with little dolls in fancy skating outfits. Skiers slide perilously down imitation snow hills at either end. At each place there is a small Santa Claus standing with a chocolate reindeer on a mound of sparkling snow.

"The dinner menu is pretty much the same, I imagine, as in most homes—turkey with all the trimmings, vegetables, potatoes, a light salad. This always is followed by a blazing plum pudding, fruit cake and mince pie. By the way, we make our own fruit cake and we've already put several away to 'ripen'.

"Well, so much for the dinner. But those foods I already have mentioned play but a small part in our holiday culinary program. Candies, for instance, get star billing since this is the one time of the year when we have lots of it around—all sorts of candy, chocolates, hard candies, and peppermint sticks on the tree. But most popular of all with the children are home-made candies such as Butterscotch Caramels and special date, raisin and cocoanut confections that we have named Fruit Nuggets. And how they do enjoy having a hand in making these sweets and in cutting out fancy cookies! All three love to cook, anyway, and often are given a chance to try their hand at it. So when I announce a candy and cooky-making afternoon, you should see their smiling faces!

"Yes, we have the time of our life in the kitchen," the children's mother assured me, "with pots and spoons and candy thermometer, fancy cooky cutters and a rolling pin. And don't you believe for a minute, either, that 'too many cooks' bring about failure rather than success. Why we always have the most marvelous results, don't we?" she inquired of her fascinated listeners and a chorus of childish voices came back with an emphatic "Yes!"

Then Mildred Lloyd went on to describe the simple sugar cookies that she approves of both because of their simplicity and because they are the kind that can be cut easily into amusing and seasonal shapes. A rich Fudge Loaf also came in for mention, principally because of Peggy Lloyd's great liking for chocolate cake and fudge icing. The Lloyds' White Fruit Cake was described by Mildred also as "just the sort of thing to have on hand for Christmas parties and casual guests," although she does not approve of anything quite as rich for the children.

YOU will want to have candied fruits on hand, too, to nibble on. And, of course, you ought to have a variety of sandwich spreads for teas and buffet suppers and all forms of informal entertaining," my hostess suggested, "so let's go out to the kitchen and let the cook help us out in that respect. That is if you'd care to?" she went on inquiringly.

Would I care to? Why that was the sort of invitation I was waiting for and was just about to hint for, so I arose hastily and off we went. With the children leading the procession and with MODERN SCREEN's own photographer we descended upon the kitchen department in force.

And such a kitchen! Two of 'em, in fact. Each about the size of the Grand Central Station, I thought, as I hastily took in the mammoth refrigerator which covers the wall between the two rooms and opens into both; the center work tables in each room; the huge electric ranges, the miles of cupboards and the square miles of tiling No hotel could boast of finer equipment—nor of a better cook or a more obliging one. Far from complaining about this sudden raid she entered into the spirit of the occasion and rushed around getting out mixing bowls, spoons and ingredients. I was soon able to observe that Mrs. Lloyd's cooking abilities were not merely an idle boast and that the kids were almost as good at helping as they were at sampling.

You'll love all the recipes I jotted down. The unusual sandwiches and the Candied

Hey, Shirley Temple! You can't get away with that—where's your beard? Miss T. looks very serious about this Santa Claus business —probably her favorite role!

Fruits that I'm giving you here in a few seconds . . . the Peggy Lloyd Fudge Loaf with its rich chocolaty frosting . . . the sugar cookies for fancy cut-outs such as trees, birds, rabbits, Santa Clauses and even Mickey and Minnie Mouse! (The last named are new and, with raisins for eyes and nose, they're sure to be a sensation among the younger set!)

Then there's the White Fruit Cake—richly tempting and not too hard to make, and last, but perhaps best of all, the two candy recipes, the Fruit Nuggets and the Butterscotch Caramels.

Then, as if all that were not enough, I also am going to send to the first couple of thousand, who write in, an unusually fine candy leaflet which contains recipes for all those tempting-looking confections shown in the picture at the beginning of this article. You'll find both chocolate and Divinity Fudge in this leaflet, Penuchi, Fondant and Peppermint Wafers. Both these and the Lloyd recipes are absolutely free.

If ever you had a golden opportunity to serve the most delicious of sweets and party refreshments — at a season when they would be most appropriate and appreciated—this, my dears, is it! So don't forget and don't delay. "Mail at once for a Merry Christmas," is my advice, while the Lloyds join me in wishing you success with their sweets and in extending to you all the season's greetings.

The Lloyds' favorite sandwiches:

Men, Men, Men!

company. He liked my looks at first, but after a sample of my smugness, he didn't like my type. How do I know? Because years later we became friends and he told me. My silly stiffness had robbed me of a job. Because he had asked me so many personal questions, I just knew he was out to do me wrong. I have since found out that out-to-do-wrongers ask no questions at all. They are too busy telling you about themselves.

"Girls can't afford to be high-hat and smug in these days, especially about jobs. Good sportsmanship is the thing that counts. The girl who is always pleasant and friendly and who doesn't fret about working late hours always has an edge over the girl who is constantly kicking up a fuss. Maybe it isn't glamorous to be known as a good sport, but glamor doesn't belong in a business world." Mae stopped her constant motion, stared straight at the wall thoughtfully, for a moment, then snapped her fingers.

"Yes, even though it does shatter some illusions, let me say right here and now that glamor doesn't belong any place but in the movies. Oh, I know a lot of people think differently. Look at the hundreds of interviews that movie people give every year on 'How to Get Glamor.' Well, I don't believe in it. Not for ordinary, every-day people in an ordinary, every-day world. Glamor, like a train, gets in a girl's way and keeps her from having fun.

"What man, for example, is going to ask a glamorous creature to a happy-go-lucky picnic in the woods? Nor can he picture glamor riding in a rattletrap car or going to an amusement park. If a man is planning a Sunday trip to the shore, he's taking the girl who will be cheerful even in the face of punctures, hamburgers and rain. That's why I say glamor girls miss out on a lot of fun.

ANOTHER erroneous belief about men is the one that they always like to do all the chasing. If that were the truth, hundreds of girls wouldn't have a man or home today. How often have you sat around and waited for the 'current' apple of your eye to ask for a date? And how often have you discovered, after it was too late, that he had wanted to ask you, but hadn't dared because you had always treated him as though he were just your little brother's scooter? Yes, some men, like some horses, just have to be led. You can usually recognize the kind by his complete indifference. And if you can't let yourself take a too-friendly initiative, then tease him. At least do something to let him know you know he's alive.

"Another phoney belief is that men always prefer girls who are modest. Well, modesty is all right in some respects. But not about the things which, in your Aunt Effie's day, were 'unmentionables'—make-up, girdles, ladies' room and such. Frankness about these things not only puts you at ease, but your escort as well.

"Still there are exceptions. Modesty where evening clothes are concerned is something else again. Your beau may say, 'Boy! Ain't that somethin'!' on beholding a girl's decollete on the dance floor. But he'd probably have a fit if you turned out in the same outfit—backless, shoulderless and next to nothing underneath. Maybe he's goofy in this respect, but it's a goofiness that should be appreciated, because if he doesn't object to you in just one yard of satin, then there's something wrong somewhere, and you'll probably never have the chance of hitting your best friend in the face with a bridal bouquet. Most men feel that a too revealing gown, is just brazen!

"Another thing, my Grandmother may have found that the way to Grandfather's heart was through his tummy but that was in the days before chain restaurants. There is nothing that gets results today like 'appeal' and I don't mean just sex appeal either. No matter how efficient a business woman you are, it's smart to sometimes be deep in a quandary and to seek the advice of your boss or your beau. Don't go the whole extreme, however. Don't be too helpless and frilly. Don't just throw your whole problem in the lap of your god. Explain it sensibly, be it finances or family. Then ask him for his expert help. Remember, whether they own up to it or not, the paternal instinct is strong in men. And, give a man a chance to advise and guide you and you'll get a raise or a date—maybe both.

"As for my advice on what to do about the men you feel that you don't want to have anything to do with . . . my advice is do nothing. Nothing at all. Neither sneer nor tilt your nose. Just act as though he didn't darken your door. If he asks for a date, say, 'Sure, I'll meet you at eight,' and then let him try and find you at eight. Yes, I mean it literally. Be completely absentminded about the man you want to ignore. Don't stop speaking to him or laughing at him . . . and don't sneak around corners or you'll run into him for sure. And then won't you look silly—and won't he know right then and there that he has a power over you? And true, there are some men," Mae laughed, "who delight in such power. Like cats, they dote on trapping their mouse.

"No, because I'm naturally a peaceful soul and because I personally believe it's bad ever to make an enemy, my rules on men are trusting. I think if I were originating a course, the rules would go something like this: Always give the man the benefit of the doubt. Fraternize, don't glamorize. If he can take it, let him have it, and pick up the check yourself once in awhile."

Mae stretched and yawned. "That's all for today. If you don't mind, I'm tired and I'm hoarse . . . and the soap box is yours."

HERE ARE THE LUCKY "NEW MOVIE TYPES" CONTEST WINNERS

Congratulations to the two, out of thousands, who won the honors

Miss Liliane Kerekes of Detroit, Michigan, and Mr. F. John M. Beattie of Deerfield, Massachusetts, are the lucky winners in Modern Screen's "New Movie Types" Contest. On November 4th, jubilant and excited, they left on the promised trip to England aboard the S. S. Queen Mary, bound for thrilling entertainment in London and the unusual opportunity of a real screen test at the Gaumont-British Studios.

Miss Kerekes and Mr. Beattie were selected by Modern Screen from thousands of entries because they possess qualities which make them true new movie types as well as remarkably appealing.

In a forthcoming issue of Modern Screen we are going to let these two personally tell you about all the wonderful occurrences of their thrilling trip. They want YOU to "travel" with them and they'll take you to all the gay spots and glamorous settings they enjoyed. Best of all they will give you all the details of their screen tests at Gaumont-British Studios.

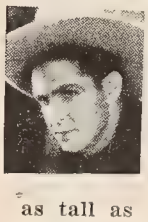
SARAH McGAFFERTY, Boonton, Pennsylvania—Yes, Dolores del Rio is the second cousin of Ramon Novarro. It might interest you to know that this much related young lady is also Gary Cooper's aunt by marriage. I wonder what relationship that makes Ramon to Gary?

DON AMECHE (First printing; total number of requests 193.) To be heard and not seen was the fate of Don Ameche for six long years. Doubtless you were one of the entranced listeners to his starring radio vehicle, "First Nighters." You and Darryl Zanuck! And when Zanuck discovered that Don was quite as seeable as he is hearable, he made him a movie actor, in fact two movie actors. With the aid of a blonde wig, Don played the roles of both Karl Freyman and Mario Singarelli in "Sins of Man," his first picture. Ameche was born in Kenosha, Wisconsin, in 1908, of Italian-English parentage. In his youth Don took to law and slaved away at the law schools of Georgetown, Marquette and Wisconsin, sort of a strolling student. Maybe this wandering college career gave him a taste for the road. At any rate, after a short stay at Wisconsin, he abandoned the law career and joined a traveling stock company. Shortly afterwards, Don passed through the ordeal of a radio audition with flying colors. There can be no doubt that radio made Don the actor he is today. Over the air your looks can't help you. Neither can gestures. It's voice that counts and you've got to put everything into your voice, or else. Don learned the trick, and that's one excellent reason why, at the end of a very few months, you fans are besieging this desk with questions about this pleasing young signor. Don is married to a childhood sweetheart, a natural blonde, and very blonde at that. In contrast is Don's Latin coloring, all except the eyes which are hazel. The Ameches have two heirs, Donnie and Ronnie, no foolin'. Don's current film for 20th Century-Fox is "One in a Million."



BOB STEELE (Last printed November, 1934. Total number of requests since then, 386.) Robert Bradbury is what his intimates call him, and he was born in Portland, Oregon, January 23, 1906, which makes him almost 31 years old. He isn't as tall as you might think, measuring 5 feet 10 inches in his stocking feet. Nice and slim at 158 pounds, he has blue eyes of the twinkling type and brown hair. His two current pictures are "Brand of the Outlaws" and "The Law Rides."

ENID PETERSEN, Butte, Montana—No, I wouldn't exactly call Joan Crawford superstitious, but she suffers from all sorts of complexes. Claustrophobia is one of the worst and that means that she is deathly afraid of shut-in places like subways and elevators. She once walked up eight flights of stairs to see her doctor. You can just bet that she needed medical attention after a long climb like that. Maybe some day Joan will clamber up eight flights to see a psychoanalyst . . . and then ride down in the elevator.

These Charming Children

their riotous games, pinning the tail on the donkey, carrying peas on a knife, racing across the lawn, as hilariously as the youngest of the young. Watching her, it was almost impossible to believe that only the day before, dressed in the forlorn tatters of the Chinese wife, she had enacted one of the most dramatically tragic scenes of "The Good Earth."

Simone Simon is a French runner-up for the Viennese Luise. Her emotions, too, are volatile, child-like and unrestrained. Simone arrived in Hollywood many months ago, armed with a long-term contract. She had been brought to this country after a brilliant success in European pictures. But the studio could find no roles to fit her individual charm. So she waited and waited. Everyone was against her, she believed. She had no friends in this strange country. With the hurt feelings of disappointed childhood, she pouted and refused to mingle with other people, preferring to be alone and lonely. She was the dramatic and colorful picture of a broken-hearted, little girl, staring into the window of a forbidden sweet shop.

Then came her big opportunity in "Girls' Dormitory." The little Simone literally put that picture in her pocket and walked away with it. She became a star overnight. And, like the happy child, who is finally given the biggest plum in the biggest pie in the shop window, she fairly radiated exuberant joy. She made friends with her fellow men. She played laughing, vigorous tennis at one of the popular clubs. But that doesn't mean that Simone is a changed person. Tomorrow something may happen and she will return to her red-lipped loneliness and silent pouting. Hollywood expects that. It would be disappointed if its Luises and Simones failed to change their moods with their frocks.

Loretta Young goes to see herself in "Ladies in Love." You don't have to be told her escort is Eddie Sutherland—he's that devoted to the lady.

THAT changeableness is a quality shared by all the Hollywood children. Today they are down in the deepest dumps. Tomorrow they are on the highest heights. One morning I met Isabel Jewell on the stairway leading to the executive offices of her studio. She was crying bitter tears. She knew that she was all washed-up in Hollywood. She wanted to take the first plane out of town. Her disappointment and grief were pathetic. She had just learned that the powers-that-be had left on the cutting room floor her biggest scenes from her last picture. The reason was easily understood. Isabel's artistry threatened to steal the dramatic honors from the picture's expensive feminine star.

Late that same day I met her again. The tiny Jewell was bubbling with joy. Entirely forgotten was the sorrow of the morning. She had been given a really big role, one of the coveted parts of the year, in a really big picture. She was walking on clouds. Everything was bright and rose-colored. She loved Hollywood.

Don't think for one moment that Isabel Jewell is a child in intelligence. She is one of the smartest, most brilliant young women in pictures. But, like all the successful Hollywood players, she is a child in her emotions. That is the reason for her being an actress. If she had not possessed that quality of enduring youth, she probably would have continued in her career as a school teacher, which she gave up to follow the lure of the stage.

Myrna Loy, the poised and elegant Wife Number One of the screen, knows how to play a game of hide-and-seek which would bring joy to the heart of any imaginative youngster. She manages to keep her studio, her friends and Hollywood in a continuous state of excitement and wonder. Before she became a real-life wife, the bride of Arthur Hornblow, Jr., Myrna changed her houses as often as other children change their favorite games. All the Loy homes were located as far off the beaten path as possible. When Myrna entered their doors she went into a mysterious silence and seclusion. To talk to her by phone it was necessary to play a telephone game which consisted of calling a succession of unknown and unlisted numbers. Finally, after a half dozen calls, you heard the low Loy voice.

One of Myrna's greatest joys was her ability to keep secret the places of her vacations. Her secretary, alone, knew where to reach her. Several times, when Myrna had hinted that she was departing for the desert or the mountains, she remained quietly in her own home, sleeping and reading and entertaining the few friends whom she could trust to keep the secret of her whereabouts. She was as proud as a triumphant youngster when she returned to the studio and announced that she had been no farther away from Hollywood than Beverly Hills. It was a part of that glorious game of childhood which Myrna, like the others, persists in playing.

The men are as adept at the game as are the women. Imagine a full-grown and successful doctor or lawyer racketing around his home town in a dilapidated white roadster, sending young women corsages of vegetables and spending long, valuable hours in the arrangement of gags for a surprise birthday party for a fellow doctor or lawyer. It's impossible even to imagine it. The entire community would immediately brand him as balmy, touched in the head, too flighty to be trusted. Yet Clark Gable did those very same things and, instead of censuring him, Hollywood vociferously applauded him. For months he drove the broken-down car which was sent to him by Carole Lombard, one of Hollywood's most madcap youngsters. In return he sent Carole elaborate bouquets of garden vegetables. Also the busy, hard-working Clark devoted one entire day to the rigging up of an intricate loud speaker system on a sound stage. Through the concealed horns loud and ridiculous birthday messages were shouted at regular intervals to Wallace Beery.

FRED ASTAIRE, like Clark, is one of the hardest-working men in Hollywood. Dancing is the breath of life to him. He is as serious about it as every successful man is about his profession. The shooting of the dancing scenes in his pictures is a long and tiresome process. He and Ginger Rogers rehearse for long, weary hours. They serve as their own stand-ins, dancing the routine of their steps while the cameramen and electricians adjust the lights and lenses so that every movement of their swaying bodies is in perfectly illuminated focus. It is during that stand-in service that Fred and Ginger entertain the company and crew with insane, impromptu steps and contortions which the public never sees. Weary as they may be, Fred and Ginger, like two irrepressible children, make play of what, otherwise, would be drudgery.

Their parties are another way of expressing their youthful craving and capacity for laughter and fun. There was Carole Lombard's fun-house affair, when she engaged an amusement park for an evening and turned her guests loose to slide and shriek and tumble with the hilarity of youthful hoodlums. The nervous-breakdown party, given in honor of Mrs. Donald Ogden Stewart, where the grown-up children arrived at high noon garbed in the tails and high hats, the chiffons and low-cut velvets of the evening hours. Roller skating fests where they throw their dignities and their equilibriums to the four winds. The barn dance where the guests rode miles in hay wagons and danced in a rough-floored stable. The "kiddie" parties, where they rig themselves in Boy Scout suits and French doll frocks and play the well remembered games of their childhood.

Their zest for fun seems unquenchable. Their imaginations run riot tirelessly. They indulge in the unrestrained antics which belong to a youth that cannot and will not die. There are several scenes which no one, who saw them, will ever forget. Lawrence Tibbett, lying flat on his back on a living-room floor, singing grand opera melodies while he kept time with his feet and grinned at the circle of applauding listeners. Jean Harlow, gowned in white satin and ermine, lighting matches under the canvas seat of the chair in which Clark Gable was sitting. Johnny Weissmuller suddenly interrupting his lunch to throw Lupe Velez over one shoulder and carry her, screaming and kicking and laughing, from the studio commissary. Leslie Howard, a scarlet bathrobe covering the blue of his Romeo costume, climbing up on a wobbly ladder to make his own motion pictures of a scene from "Romeo and Juliet," played by Norma Shearer and John Barrymore. Bob Montgomery doing a spring dance on the top of a row of files in the studio's publicity office. Mae West screaming in her excitement at the Friday night fights. Jeanette MacDonald arriving on the stage in a huge dog house after she had been scolded for her tardiness by Director W. S. Van Dyke.

Their griefs, their enthusiasms and their dislikes are as violent as their play. Like irresponsible children, they quarrel violently one day and make peace the next. They race from one game to another, from Truth to Monopoly to Handies to Knock-Knock. Each game holds the center of interest for a short time. The children play it with all their vim and vigor. Then they tire of it and discard it in favor of some new diversion.

Their very speech reflects their intensity. It is studded with superlatives and embroidered with a childish demonstrativeness. They shower "Dears" and "Darlings" upon each other. Today they are "mad about" one thing. Tomorrow they think something else is "absolutely wonderful." Everything is either the best or the worst. There is no happy and uninteresting medium for them. They have the ability of endowing the most commonplace happening with a bright warmth and color.

There is little wonder, being as they are, that their romances are so many and so turbulent. They bring to each new love affair the romantic glamor which high-school boys and girls give to their first heart throbs.

They refuse to grow old and blasé. They are proud of their zest for living, their youthful freshness of emotion. They strive to keep that young enthusiasm because they know that, when they lose it, when they grow up into adult seriousness and staidness and boredom, their day of

Caused by Tired Kidneys
Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.
The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.
If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.
Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

★★ Adventure in Manhattan

(Columbia)

Jean Arthur, Joel McCrea and Reginald Owen do their best—which is always good—to make something of this assignment. But the plot flattens this picture in spite of their efforts. It is one of those mystery tales where not only the audience is kept in the dark, but the main characters seem a bit bewildered. Joel McCrea has the role of an amazing young man who has psychic powers when it comes to crime. He becomes so obnoxious to his fellow reporters after successfully foretelling a series of thefts and murders that they decide to take him down a notch. Jean Arthur, an actress, is hired to help them since McCrea has boasted that no woman can ever interfere with his brainwork. Jean manages to interfere considerably, but in the end helps him solve the biggest crime of the day. Reginald Owen is at the bottom of this crime. He plays the jewel thief who has been at large for more years than the police departments of several countries would like to remember. This kind of picture may serve to get some people's minds off their troubles, but it is doubtful diversion for the majority.

★★ Along Came Love

(Paramount)

Here we have the perpetual Hollywood Cinderella story in different guise and a right amusing little film it turns out to be. Nothing great, but full of infectious gaiety that communicates itself to the audience. Leaping directly into the cock-eyed plot, Cinderella (alias Irene Hervey) is an ash-can saleslady in the basement of a huge Manhattan store. Given to hero-worship and astronomy, she falls in love with the constellation Orion, of all things. When she meets one John Patrick O'Ryan, Park Avenue medical student, Cinderella switches her fixation from a celestial body to one more embraceable, but just as remote to her. Irene Franklin, playing Cinderella's mother, sings lustily, taps and rolls up a major portion of the laughs for herself. If your heart warms to film old-timers, you will welcome the sight of H. B. Warner and Doris Kenyon. Irene Hervey, Charles Starrett, Bernadene Hayes, Ferdinand Gottschalk and Charles Judels contribute greatly to the general sprightliness.

★ The Man I Marry

(Universal)

This comedy won't have you in stitches, but you can't miss a couple of good laughs anyway. Besides, it is worth seeing in order to get acquainted with Doris Nolan, who makes her promising celluloid debut here. She plays the role of Nigel Bruce's and Marjorie Gateson's niece. Nigel's chief interest in life is producing plays while his wife's is scaling the social ladder. For her cause she manages to get Doris Nolan affianced to Gerald Oliver-Smith, an Englishman on the stuffy side. When Doris beats a retreat to a deserted house she runs smack into Michael Whalen, a playwright on the genius side. All should be clear sailing from then on, but they manage to string along for several reels before realizing it's Love. In the meantime, Doris swipes Michael's play and gives it to her uncle, thereby saving him from bankruptcy and paving the way to fame for Mr. Whalen, who is so against this sort of thing that they have to lock him up in jail to keep him under control. An obviously padded plot is lightened by some good dialogue and comedy by Chic Sale. Skeets Gallagher and Cliff Edwards do some cutting up as a couple of drunks, but they fall pretty flat.

★★ The President's Mystery

(Republic)

This picture was taken from the Franklin D. Roosevelt opus recently published in a national weekly. Though a political tale, involving economic conditions chiefly, it is packed with suspense from the first reel, when a successful attorney, Henry Wilcoxon, decides to disappear from the world and his wife, both having wearied him for some years. He establishes his death by purchasing a corpse and running it over a bridge in his car. Having liquidated his fortune, he then starts out by bus for his new life, only to read in the next day's paper that his wife has been murdered and that he is the guilty party, his own suicide proving his guilt. From then on the story becomes involved

What Do You Do with Your Little Finger?

—when you pick up a glass or cup? . . . You know from watching others that charm and poise can be destroyed instantly by the misuse of hands. And by the same token, the correct use of your hands can become a tremendous social and business asset. Great actresses accomplish much of their poise by proper hand action.

The makers of Frostilla—the famous skin lotion that keeps hands, face and body smooth and lovely—asked Margery Wilson, the international authority on charm and poise, to tell

- how to hold a cigarette
- how to pick up cards
- how to shake hands
- and how to make hands behave to the best advantage on all occasions

Margery Wilson gives the authoritative answers to these and other questions in an illustrated booklet on How to Use Your Hands Correctly. Although this booklet is priced at 50c, we have arranged to present it without charge to Frostilla users in the United States and Canada until May 30th, 1937.

Just mail the front of a 35c, 50c or $1.00 Frostilla Fragrant Lotion box (or two fronts from 10c sizes) and your copy will be sent FREE.

with a coöperative cannery which Wilcoxon becomes interested in. Strikes and communism add dramatic interest, while Betty Furness provides the romantic element. All goes well until Sidney Blackmer, an unscrupulous attorney, who knew Wilcoxon before his disappearance, begins tightening the net about him. Wilcoxon is outstanding, while Betty Furness and Evelyn Brent contribute good work. The comedy scenes are carried off with a flourish by Barnett Parker, as the seemingly stupid butler whose brainwork finally saves the day.

★★ Rose Bowl

(Paramount)

If you are college age or collegiate by nature, you'll get a lot of fun out of this picture. It winds up, of course, with football in the Rose Bowl, and the hero, Tom Brown, crashing through for his alma mammy. But football is not the only thing in the picture. Benny Baker introduces a glass-breaking gag that is the funniest thing he's done in celluloid. Then there is Eleanore Whitney who hasn't a single tap to do in this one, but shows definite proof of dramatic ability and looks pretty enough to inspire any team on to victory. Larry Crabbe does a nice job as the handsome football hero for whom Eleanore has been pining only to learn that Larry isn't at all interested, while it's Tom Brown in whom beats the heart of gold. Nydia Westman, as Eleanore's sister and partner in a college town candy shop, gives a good account of herself as does William Frawley in the role of football coach. Good gags, good football and good-looking girls make this film diverting entertainment.

★ Sing Me a Love Song

(First-National)

The scene is the employees' lunch room at Haines' department store. At the table are Patricia Ellis and ZaSu Pitts of the sheet music department, Allen Jenkins, an elevator operator, and James Melton, a newcomer to the music department. When Jenkins complains of the food, Miss Ellis reminds him that Mr. Haines, Jr., who has just taken over the management of the store, will no doubt make many improvements. The employees' lunch room soon looks like a nightclub and Mr. Melton, between songs, finds time to see that the charms of Patricia Ellis are more numerous than those of Ann Sheridan, his wealthy fiancée. Most of the picture's amusing moments are furnished by Hugh Herbert, a rich guy, who is also a kleptomaniac. James Melton's voice is splendid, but his acting still leaves something to be desired.

★★ The Smartest Girl In Town

(RKO-Radio)

There isn't much to this picture, but everyone seemed to have a fine time—not only the cast but the audience. It is another of those Gene Raymond-Ann Sothern comedies, with both of them at their gayest. And if you like the way Gene and Ann go gay, this picture is for you. If you don't, Helen Broderick and Eric Blore will make you feel your ticket was a safe investment. Erik Rhodes supplies some laughs with his characterization of the bewildered baron who is courting Ann with the enthusiastic coöperation of Ann's sister, Helen Broderick, who thinks a girl should marry strictly for money, she having married for no other reason than love. Believing that clothes may not make the man but certainly help a woman make a man, Helen starts Ann on a career of modelling the smartest apparel in town. When the company hires Gene Raymond's yacht for an advertising background, she proves her point. Though, of course, Gene would have adored Ann in last year's kitchen number. Gene thinks up a really cute idea of pretending to be the male model hired for the picture, and you can imagine Ann's surprise after several reels to find that she's fallen in love with a multimillionaire! It's that kind of story, well padded with snappy dialogue and a few genuinely comic sequences.

★★ Three Men on a Horse

(Warner Bros.)

Though the laughs fall short of those garnered by the stage version, "Three Men on a Horse" is still good screen fare. Teddy Hart and Sam Levene are the only ones rounded up of the original New York stage company. Others in the cast are Frank McHugh, Guy Kibbee, Allen Jenkins, Carol Hughes and Joan Blondell—to give you an idea of the comedy offered for your money. Frank McHugh is the hero, though on the Caspar Milquetoast type. His life work is writing greeting card ditties, until he discovers, quite by chance, that he is equally talented at picking horses. So good is he that a gang of toughies, headed by Sam Levene, kidnap McHugh, much to the joy of Joan Blondell who is Sam's girl friend and always has had a poetic side to her nature, too. Follows a tale that race-track addicts will lap up, but that still is humorous enough to provide entertainment for the rest of the audience. McHugh goes through gruelling and hilarious experiences before he is finally returned to his wife, Carol Hughes, whose nagging had turned poor Frank to the bottle in the first place. And Guy Kibbee, his boss, forgives him even if Frank did slip up on his annual Mother's Day verses.

★★ Tarzan Escapes

(M-G-M)

Another Tarzan tale on the screen is always good news to the Burroughs' fans. But this should be the best news yet, since it tops all previous Tarzan thrillers. Johnny Weissmuller has never had himself a better time in all his years of Tarzanning, in spite of suffering dirty work at the hands of John Buckler, an animal collector who decides to take him back to England as Exhibit A. As if that weren't hectic enough, there's in-law trouble for Tarzan. The relatives of his mate, Maureen O'Sullivan, suddenly drop into their honeymoon cottage in the tree tops and lure the bride back to civilization. But you can't keep a Weissmuller down for more than a few reels, so he gets matters straightened out eventually with help from a herd of elephants. There are grand shots of animal life throughout this celluloider, to say nothing of the jungle background photography, which should make the picture enjoyable for those less active by nature than the majority of Tarzan fans. In the supporting cast, Maureen O'Sullivan gives a sincere and likeable performance. Benita Hume and William Henry, as her cousins, are good. E. E. Clive, Herbert Mundin and John Buckler contribute satisfactory characterizations — and Cheetah almost steals the picture with his histrionics.

★ A Woman Rebels

(RKO-Radio)

This is old-fashioned melodrama, a costume play lacking in pace and dramatic force, despite good performances by most of the cast. It tells the story of Pamela Thistlewaite and her rebellion against the straight-laced standards of mid-Victorian England. Lonely and unhappy because of her tyrannical father and the marriage of her only sister, she succumbs to the charms of a gay blade from London. Her baby arrives at the time of her sister's death, so Pamela's child, as far as the world knows, is her niece. From then on she crusades for women's rights and hides her secret and her love for Sir Thomas Lane (Herbert Marshall) until the truth is finally revealed in a divorce suit. You can recognize the ancient plot in spite of its fancy dress disguise as the picture moves slowly to its inevitable ending.

★★★ Come and Get It

(Samuel Goldwyn)

Here's as lusty and loud a screen drama as you could wish to see. Adapted from Edna Ferber's novel, it bristles with life and shouts its way through an hour and a half of good, vigorous entertainment. Starting out as a story of the northern Wisconsin lumber camps in the 80's, it becomes, in the end, a dramatic and powerful love triangle. It is the story of Barney Glasgow (Edward Arnold), whose unquenchable thirst for wealth and prominence leaves the forests devastated and the dance hall gal who loves him heart-broken. He wants to marry the boss' daughter to promote his future, but she (Frances Farmer) weds his lumberjack pal (Walter Brennan). Years later, rich and respectable, he returns to his old haunts, meets his former sweetheart's daughter (also played by Frances Farmer) and falls in love with her. He brings her home with him and at this point his power to get what he wants, is broken, for the gal falls in love with his son (Joel McCrea). Edward Arnold's performance is excellent, and Walter Brennan is swell as the lumberjack. You fans will agree that Frances Farmer has a definite screen future.

★ Wild Brian Kent

(Sol Lesser-RKO)

This picture is almost as flat as the Kansas prairies which serve as its background. Ralph Bellamy is the supposedly wild young man of the title role, who after a few years of reckless dissipation in the big city turns to the corn country and the good life. Here he meets Mae Clarke, who lives in mortal fear that the farm owned by her aunt and uncle is going to be foreclosed by the city slicker. However, Ralph has thrown his money away with a lavish hand by this time. But he hies himself to town and talks the would-be forecloser into loaning him enough money to ship Mae's sheep to market. Mae gets the money all right, but she also gets some of the infected sheep belonging to the big meanie mixed up in her shipment. Things look pretty dark again, but Ralph saves that day, too. The next problem is to get the wheat crop in. Excitement mounts steadily because you have a feeling that the villain will surely put a monkey-wrench in the threshing machine or something. But he foils everyone by just setting a match to the ripe field of grain. Our hero arrives on the field just in the nick of time, and Ralph Bellamy beating out fifty acres of flaming farina is undoubtedly the high point of this picture.

★ 15 Maiden Lane

This offers enough thrills to be pleasantly diverting to fans of an adventurous turn of mind. Those with a skeptical viewpoint may find it hard to take in spots. Concerning the jewel trade, which centers around Maiden Lane in New York City, the plot thickens in the first reel with the discovery that a diamond of fabulous price has been stolen from a merchant in the building. Robert McWade is owner of the insurance company which must stand the price, if it is not recovered and Claire Trevor is his niece who sets about saving him the dough by locating the gang of jewel thieves. Miss Trevor's celluloid courage is a thing to marvel at—the more dangerous the crook or the situation, the more she is intrigued. Cesar Romero is the suave and supposedly clever thief, who falls into the blonde's trap, without even so much as bothering to find out her connections—a little matter that would have saved his life in the last reel. However, there are some believable and really exciting sequences which build suspense to the final clean-up of the gang. Romero's role does not give him opportunity for his undeniable gifts. Claire Trevor is attractive to look at and gets the most from the part assigned her. Douglas Fowley is good as the go-between, while Lloyd Nolan and Robert McWade pass muster.

(Universal)

As the "Luckiest Girl in the World" Jane Wyatt does not make too favorable an impression. In the first place, the story is too weak in spots to carry conviction and, in the second place, players cast with her don't help matters along much. Miss Wyatt is attractive to look at, but lacks picture personality—at least at this stage of the game. Of the entire cast Eugene Pallette and Viola Callahan are the only outstanding players. The others, including Louis Hayward, Catherine Doucet, Nat Pendleton and Philip Reed are merely satisfactory. Pallette plays the millionaire whose daughter, Jane Wyatt, is madly in love with Philip Reed. Phil's a young man whose outstanding qualification for marriage is that he plays a fine game of tennis.

Papa says Jane can marry him, if she can manage to live on $150 for one month in New York City. This wouldn't be too tough for most gals, but Jane has such a struggle. Louis Hayward, a young man renting a room in the same boardinghouse, practically has to feed her, and love blooms over the burnt hamburger. Nat Pendleton, as the bodyguard hired to watch over Jane, provides most of the laughs, but it's too much the same type of Pendleton gagging. Hayward and Miss Wyatt fall pretty flat in their attempts at light comedy. Viola Callahan, in a short bit, as the boarding-house keeper, is at least believable.

★★★ The Garden of Allah
(United Artists)

With the industry's knowledge of the intricacies of technicolor advancing with each color film, "The Garden of Allah" takes advantage of previous experiments and emerges as the most beautiful series of photographs thus far brought to the screen.

If you think Marlene Dietrich was beautiful in black and white, wait until you see her in color! She is, as the French have it, the nuts. So with Dietrich looking radiant, beautiful moonlight shots of the desert and superb acting by Charles Boyer, one forgets that the story is hardly modern and that at times the picture's pace is a decidedly lethargic one. The story is about a Trappist monk who renounces his sacred vows and flees from the monastery, whereupon he falls in love with a woman who, like himself, is searching for happiness. They marry, but their idyll is ended when, his secret discovered, the former monk returns to his life of celibacy.

Although acting honors go to Charles Boyer, Marlene Dietrich acquits herself surprisingly well in a role eminently suited to her special talents. In a beautiful dance sequence, Tilly Losch proves herself an exotic screen personality.

There are also capable performances by Joseph Schildkraut, John Carradine, Basil Rathbone and C. Aubrey Smith.

★★ Under Your Spell
(20th Century-Fox)

Here's Lawrence Tibbett again, in finest singing form, to prove he is the screen's premiere baritone. Also, that he can go through dramatic paces with the greatest of ease. It's too bad that the story is superficial and does not match up to the depth and beauty of his rich tones. But as long as Tibbett sings frequently and stirringly, the plot is of small matter. In addition to the exquisite music (there's an excerpt from "Faust" that will make your blood tingle, the two typical Tibbett numbers—"Under Your Spell" and "My Little Mule Wagon") is the custom-built story of the concert artist, who is a martyr to the demands of fame. Between cigarette-endorsing and back-patting audition winners, life is pretty vapid for the baritone—until the girl comes along. Patterned after the zany type popularized by Carole Lombard in "My Man Godfrey," Cynthia Drexel (Wendy Barrie) is rich, pampered and given to breaking dishes in moments of stress. To spite a social rival, she engages the baritone to sing at a party. When the singer jumps all contracts in an effort to "get away from it all" the willful miss pursues him to his mountain cabin to force him to fulfill her commitment. Failing, she will have to marry a man she doesn't love, because she made a bet that way. You know the rest.

More Good News

termission. The mystery, according to Cesar, is: which of his so-called friends handed him an exploding cigarette?

More fun on the "After the Thin Man" set. In one scene, Bill Powell was to enter a prison cell with several young ladies. After getting the party locked up in the jug, Director Van Dyke and crew calmly left for lunch. But they returned to find Powell having a swell time—and a swell lunch—with the gals. Seems he had yelled out an order to the studio commissary, and they had shoved their fanciest five-course luncheon through the bars. Since guys in jail have no money, Van Dyke is still wondering whether his gag was worth the price of the stiff lunch check he had to pay.

Now that winter has hit Hollywood—the thermometer has dropped to 70°—everyone heads for Palm Springs and the desert every week-end. There the glamor girls and boys can get away from work and the cruel cold for a few days while they grow radiant under the southern sun and the pleasant publicity. The desert resorts are more popular than ever this season and tourists wanting to rub sun-tans with their favorites should come armed with ample check-books. At one of the spas, for instance, you can purchase the regular luncheon for $2.00, and if you wish the added distinction of having plunged into the same pool with a $5,000-a-week cutie, another $2.00 takes care of that. And why not? After all, what can they raise on the desert but prices?

On a clear day, as the saying goes, you can see Bob Taylor's dressing-gown from San Francisco. He startled the waitresses at the studio commissary with it the first few days, but they're getting used to it. Personally, we think it's a trick to hide his identity, because the robe is so startling you hardly notice who's in it.

On the "After the Thin Man" set at M-G-M, Director W. S. Van Dyke was preparing to shoot a scene. Jessie Ralph was to say a few words to Sam ("Three Men on a Horse") Levene. Levene is from Broadway and Van Dyke had been giving him the ribbing most newcomers get. After the first rehearsal Van Dyke asked Levene to show more of his profile. Levene complied, and they went over it once more. Van Dyke asked for still more profile, and he got it and they shot the scene. "How was I?" asked Levene. "I don't know," replied Van Dyke. "You aren't in this scene."

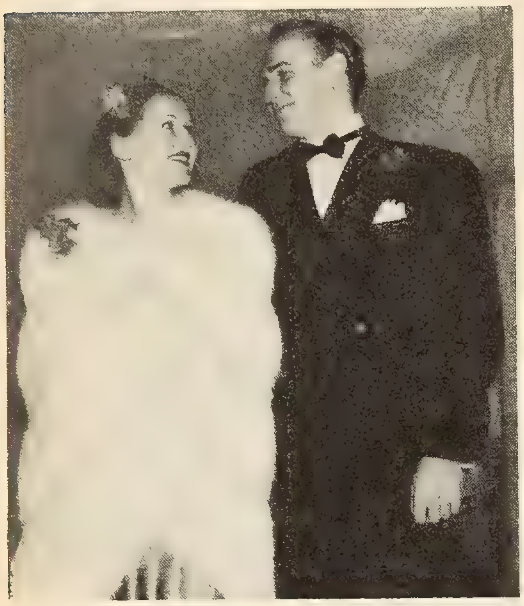
Mr. and Mrs. Fred Astaire who don't care for cameramen much.



Betty Grable and Jackie Coogan prove it's still romance!

When two burglars parked themselves in the garage of the Ravenswood Apartments, one evening recently, they lined up the tenants as they arrived and relieved them of their cash and jewelry. They were really marking time waiting for Mae West, who owns the building and lives in it. But Mae was at the fights and the thieves decided to come up and see her some other time, much to the relief of the other tenants who knew that Mae would be accompanied by her two bodyguards, which might have meant considerable gun-play.

Jean Harlow's so crazy about badminton that she's torn up a bedroom in her home and made a badminton court of it. Badminton courts should be outside, but Jean shouldn't because the sun doesn't agree with her. Hence the inside court for Harlow. Or is it because Bill Powell had to spend most of his days in darkened rooms for a spell on account of a bad case of looking too often at studio lights?

Jeanette MacDonald is back in town after visiting in New York and Philadelphia with her mother and sisters. In the meantime, Gene Raymond has been making daily trips to San Fernando Valley, where the MacDonald-Raymond home is being nailed together. According to their understanding, there'll be no wedding until the house is completed. And there's talk around that Mr. R. is trying to convince Jeanette that she really ought to see Yuma at this time of the year.

Susan Carrie Saunders is the reason you're not seeing Fay Wray in celluloid these days. Susan Carrie's taken all of Fay's time since her arrival a couple of months ago. What's more, there's talk of Fay giving up her movie career and devoting herself exclusively to home, husband and daughter. They may make their home in England, where John Monk Saunders is writing for British films.

Bing Crosby thought up the idea of mid-ocean previews. There have been pre-showings of pictures on planes, trains and busses, but never on the briny. When Bing left on his trip to Hawaii, he had Columbia book passage for a print of "Pennies from Heaven," his new picture, which he hadn't seen. But he'll never do it again, for he had to see the film every night for the five nights of the trip. Passengers in every class demanded to see the preview and asked that Bing be present to lend a bit of atmosphere. You can't turn down a boat load of customers, which is why Bing was so glad to see land and the last of "Pennies from Heaven."

Mickey Rooney's face was several shades of red the other day, instead of the even freckled sun-tan it usually is. Because he was due back to the studio immediately after a broadcast, Mickey didn't have any spare time to change into the tuxedo which he was supposed to wear for his next scene. So he decided to change in the car while en route. Imagine his chagrin when his chauffeur stopped at a traffic signal right outside Hollywood high school and he found himself with an audience of admiring co-eds.

It takes time, but gradually Greta gets around to things. Make-up boxes, for instance, took her ten years to appreciate. The Silent One's make-up has always been carried around in a shoe box on the set until a few weeks ago when she suddenly appeared on the "Camille" set carrying a swanky purple leather one under her arm, and smiling fondly at the crew and Robert Taylor. Taylor, it turned out, just happened to be in the way, for the smiles were all for the crew. And particularly for Harry Edwards, prop man on the picture, who was the donor of the gift to Garbo.

Lilliane and John take off for an air view of England.

Gaumont-British make-up artists get Lilliane Kerekes and John Beattie ready for tests.

THEY'RE BACK! And what fascinating experiences those two lucky winners of our "New Movie Types" Contest had to relate.

Even while their baggage was going through Customs, Lilliane Kerekes and John Beattie talked enthusiastically about what they did from the moment they sailed for England on the Queen Mary until their last few minutes on board the Berengaria, coming home.

Going over, both Lilliane and John got a great kick out of meeting and mingling with famous people. Douglas Fairbanks, Sr. was on board and they met him. One night a party was given in honor of Lilliane. And every day there was the constant round of shipboard activities—all a new scene for the two.

We asked John what he thought was the highlight of the trip as far as he was concerned. He answered quickly that he got the biggest thrill out of their trip through the House of Commons and the (Continued on page 88)

Five-Star Capers

The unpredictable Quintuplets go Hollywood again

By Henry Phillips

SPEAKING of the Quintuplets as "The Five Most Famous Screen Stars" may seem like a haphazard statement. Nevertheless, there are many astounding facts to support the contention that the Dionnettes might have a slight edge on even Shirley Temple if a showdown were possible. No one desires a poll, however, and there probably never will be one. Setting aside all facts and figures, the five little Canadians still command first place in the human interest headlines throughout the universe. All without a press-agent!

And no wonder! The youngsters put on a show twice daily on their "lot" in far-off Callander, Ontario, "if the weather permits." The performance goes on throughout spring, summer and autumn and during a great part of the winter. At the last showing we witnessed, the "house" numbered ten thousand persons, and according to the records, we were in the neighborhood of the two-millionth onlooker. Automobiles from nearly every State in the Union and all the Provinces of Canada were parked by the hundreds on the hill and stretched for miles down the road. This was the second show; three thousand more had been there in the morning and departed for their distant homes—Texas, California, Georgia. . . .

The show is unique because there are no precedents, the performers have no prototypes. The little stars don't even know that a show is going on, or that they have an audience!

Just how to preserve all the sweet naturalness that is the essence of the Dionne Quintuplets was the hardest job that ever confronted a moving picture director. When Norman Taurog directed their first picture a year ago, "The Country Doctor," the task had been comparatively simple. The budding stars had just passed their first birthday. They were just sweet babies, barely able to creep about and do all the cunning things that most all babies do—multiplied by five. However, in making the newest movie, "Reunion," they found five husky, mischievous young ladies, each with a mind of her own and a pair of sturdy legs ever ready to carry her in the direction her strong will had predetermined she was going to go. For a whole year the youngsters had been driving along extreme, "natural" lines of non-restraint in their bringing up. Though they were born at the same time and looked exactly alike to the stranger, externally, they were as utterly different in their ideas as though they had been members of an infantile (Continued on page 96)

To producers, to director and to a great cast—brilliantly headed by Humphrey Bogart in a role even more intensely dynamic than his "Killer" of "Petrified Forest"—alike are due the plaudits of a million fans for making this thrilling indictment of the world below the underworld this month's tops in cinema excitement!

"Green Light" is the winner this month of Modern Screen's Award of Merit.

Here are the leads, Anita Louise and Errol Flynn, receiving the placque from our Hollywood Editor, Leo Townsend.

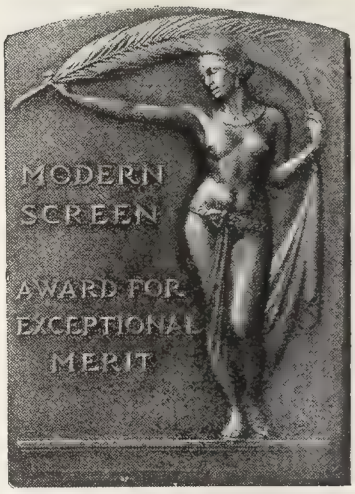
The entire cast was delighted with the honor conferred upon their picture.

We Salute "Green Light"

Our congratulations, this month, are tendered to those capable people who have made possible such a splendid picturization of the Lloyd C. Douglas best seller, "Green Light."

These monthly awards by Modern Screen are your guides to the cream of the year's picture crop. Only those pictures rate the medal which offer the finest in entertainment value for you. These are the about-to-be-released pictures which you will want to put on your "must" list. Watch for our next month's Award of Merit—it means another evening's assured entertainment for you!

Director Frank Borzage, a master hand at turning out fine pictures, gets the most out of the original novel, dramatizing it with a nicety that spells big box-office appeal. And he gets the most out of his talented cast. Errol Flynn and Anita Louise both reach new acting heights in their characterizations. Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Margaret Lindsay, Spring Byington and Walter Abel share honors.



Modern Screen's Medal Award Picture, "Green Light," a First National-Cosmopolitan production, reviewed by Leo Townsend

Author Lloyd C. Douglas owes a deep bow to the picture industry. In his novels, his inspirational themes and his "Glory, Hallelujah!" shouting are often overdone and are certainly not regarded with enthusiasm by critical or sophisticated readers. "Magnificent Obsession," for instance, was hardly a literary triumph, yet its picture version was one of last year's biggest box-office attractions.

As a novel, "Green Light" parallels the earlier Douglas work, while as a picture it offers strong audience appeal which will undoubtedly place it among the most popular films of 1937. It excels "Magnificent Obsession" in construction and execution, for it is much more plausible than its predecessor. Its greatest asset is that it offers Errol Flynn in his first non-costume role, and for that it deserves considerable applause, for young Mr. Flynn proves beyond all doubt that he is one of the most interesting new players to come to the screen in several years. In this, his third picture, he establishes himself as Robert Taylor's leading rival for the hearts—and also the patronage—of the country's feminine theatre-goers.

Briefly, the story concerns a young surgeon (Flynn) in a metropolitan hospital. Dr. Endicott (Henry O'Neill), head surgeon of the hospital, has allowed himself to become more interested in Wall Street than in his own institution. When Mrs. Dexter (Spring Byington), one of the hospital's wealthy patronesses, needs an emergency operation, Dr. Endicott is busy at his broker's office. Flynn orders the operation begun immediately. In the middle of proceedings, Dr. Endicott bustles into the operating room, nervous after just losing a fortune in Wall Street, and commits an error which leads to Mrs. Dexter's death. Dr. Endicott allows the blame to fall on Flynn, who resigns from the hospital, embittered and sour on life. A chance meeting with Dean Harcourt (Sir Cedric Hardwicke), whose radio sermons had been an inspiration to Mrs. Dexter, also leads him to meet Phyllis Dexter (Anita Louise), who believes him responsible for her mother's death. It is the Dean's problem to adjust his two young friends to themselves and to the world.

In the role of the young surgeon, Errol Flynn offers a vital and moving study of a man to whom life has lost its meaning. The handsome young Irishman has virility, charm and—in case you didn't notice it in his costume pictures—considerable acting ability. As Phyllis Dexter, Anita Louise gets her best screen opportunity to date. Perhaps the loveliest of the younger screen stars, she is definitely advancing as an actress. Next to Flynn's performance in excellence is that of Sir Cedric Hardwicke in the role of Dean Harcourt. Long a favorite of London stage and screen audiences, he establishes himself here as one of the finest of character players. Spring Byington is entirely believable as Mrs. Dexter, and there are good performances by Margaret Lindsay, as a nurse in love with Flynn, and Walter Abel, a fellow surgeon at the hospital.

A Culinary Cruise WITH ERROL FLYNN

By Marjorie Deen

Errol Flynn has a "quick lunch" in the studio commissary after finishing "Green Light."

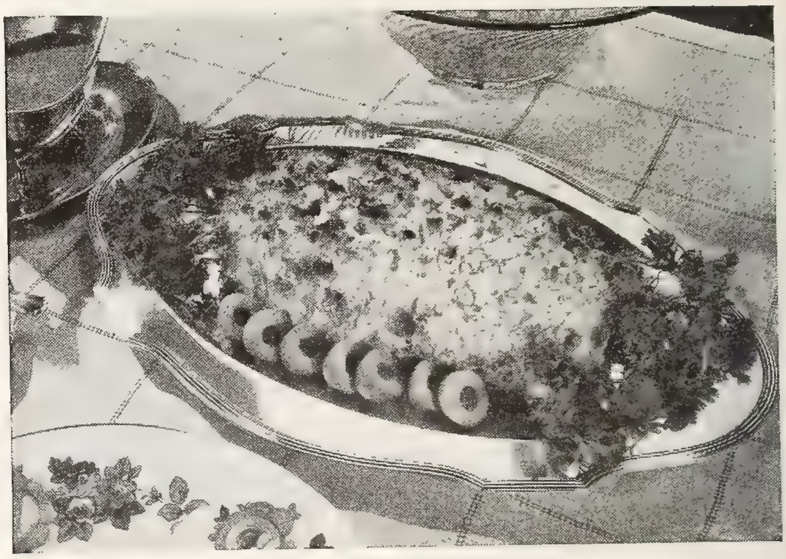
I'VE JUST been around the world with Errol Flynn! What if our magic carpet was only a tablecloth in the studio commissary; what if our voyage did take but one fleeting hour—the trip was a gay and memorable one just the same. And I came away convinced that life is full of pleasant surprises—even for a cooking editor!

For, much as I looked forward to meeting this dashing and adventurous young man, I certainly never expected to find him at all helpful for an article on foods, of all things. "Here was a man," I had thought, "who has sailed the seven seas and traveled on every continent—a man for whom life has been a continuous series of adventures. Why, if I question him about anything as commonplace as the the things he likes to eat, he'll just shut up like a clam."

But to my complete amazement he did nothing of the kind. For, as it happens, Errol has "eaten his way around the world," so to speak, loves to talk about the strange and delicious foods he has sampled on his travels and even admits he can cook. "Admits," did I say? Well, that's too mild a word, since he actually boasts of his culinary knowledge and ability. And judging from one of the menus he outlined for me—and which I shall give you later on—when it comes to eating he is quite the connoisseur.

Hard for you to imagine the swashbuckling pirate of "Captain Blood," the dashing, handsome officer of "Charge of the Light Brigade," as a food enthusiast, isn't it? And, I imagine, practically impossible for you to think of him as actually knowing how to cook. But you must remember that before his arrival in Hollywood, Errol's life was one of adventure and exploration in most of the known and some of the unknown spots on this globe of ours. Not only has he sampled many novel and appetizing dishes on his travels, but there have been times when he himself had to take a turn at the cook stove in the galley; or fix up a South Sea equivalent of an Irish stew over an open fire in the depths of the jungle. All of which, added to a naturally keen appetite, has made the debonair hero of this story unusually food-conscious. As a result, the ideas on foods that he has to offer are well worth knowing about.

Solve the "What shall I cook today?" problem by serving this delicious Mexican Tamale Loaf with Spanish Sauce. The Modern Hostess will send you the recipe for the asking.



But if you are perfectly satisfied to serve the usual things, cooked in the usual manner for days and years on end, you will find little to interest you here; for, even on the food subject, this enterprising young Irishman refuses to keep to the beaten track of familiar mediocrity. If you like novelty—foods that are different—flavors and combinations that are unusual; if your family is the kind to welcome a change with appreciative cheers, then here is a golden opportunity to add something new in the line of recipes to your collection.

This traveled Irishman suggests some "different" foods to

However, at the very outset, I think I should assure you that none of these dishes described to me in detail by Mr. Flynn will require a trip to the many countries he has visited in order to lay in your own supplies. Though each dish Errol recommended, originated in some foreign land, the ingredients that go into their making can be purchased at a point no more distant than your own corner grocery.

Let's see, then, what "different" foods he has to suggest. Foods that will take us on a cruise around the world and land us finally in Hollywood, where we'll end up by ordering—at Mr. Flynn's suggestion—a Mexican Tamale Loaf with a tasty Spanish Sauce as a final salute to the chefs of other nations.

The recipe for this last-named dish will be found in this month's recipe leaflet, together with other recipes for many (Continued on page 90)

TRAGEDY WITH A HAPPY ENDING!
FEW WEEKS LATER

Ha! Ha! My proud beauty! Now I have you in my power . . .

Mr. W.—Clap hands, Margie—what's the matter with you?

Mrs. W.—Oh, look! The curtains—one of those sheets is mine.

Mr. W.—Gosh! Is the gray one yours? It looks sick beside that nice white one.

Mrs. W.—Oh, Russ! Did you really hear all the mothers who helped put up the curtain say those things about me?

Russ W.—Yep! They said your clothes have tattle-tale gray 'cause your soap doesn't wash clean. And they wished you'd use Fels-Naptha 'cause it's got heaps of naptha in the golden soap and that chases out every speck of dirt.

Mr. W.—Great Scott! Have you still got that moustache?

Mrs. W.—Take it off—you're no villain! You saved my reputation with that tip about Fels-Naptha Soap. It's made my washes look so gorgeous, I'm going to take you to town to a real show!

BANISH "TATTLE-TALE GRAY" WITH FELS-NAPTHA SOAP!

Carole Lombard had tried her luck vainly in a number of bathing beauty comedies before Zukor discovered her. He made her the dazzling star she is today. "Swing High, Swing Low" is her next picture, Fred MacMurray, her leading man.

Gary Cooper, from Montana, might still have been just a cowboy or maybe a cartoonist, if fame hadn't caught up with him! Gary is making "Souls at Sea" as his new opus.

His Jubilee Days

Adolph Zukor looks back proudly upon twenty-five years

FOR TWENTY-FIVE years a quiet little man, almost taciturn, in his laconic brevity, has been in the glamorous business of making stars. A quarter of a century ago he rescued a little girl named Mary Pickford from the ignominy of two-reelers, and established the full-length feature productions as we know them today. He paid the little girl $10,000 a week and made her world-famous. He has been at it ever since.

His name is Adolph Zukor, the founder, organizer, and still the chief and guiding spirit in Paramount Pictures. This same Mr. Zukor, once a master furrier, can't remember when he saw his first motion picture, but he became interested in the new type of entertainment when it was little more than a glorified peep show in the penny arcades and rescued it from the somewhat cheap and tawdry nickelodeon then in vogue.

He haunted the sets of D. W. Griffith, then ensconsed in a brownstone house at 11 East 14th Street, where the little girl named Mary Pickford was working, and decided himself to become a producer. He fetched from Paris a staggering opus in four reels called "Queen Elizabeth" with Sarah Bernhardt. The "divine Sarah" was Zukor's first star. "My one chance for immortality," exclaimed Bernhardt. "Visionary and fanatic," squeaked Broadway.

SINCE THEN he has inspired the rise of more film personalities than any one man in the industry now world-wide. He persuaded Minnie Maddern Fiske, James K. Hackett, James O'Neill, father of the famous playwright, Eugene O'Neill, to join the band of thespian pioneers in celluloid. During the years which followed he has been an inveterate first-nighter, keeping an eye on new talent, ferreting out beginners and developing new actors and actresses from every field. In recent years he's gone so far as to establish his own school right on the Paramount lot from which emerged such talented newcomers as Frances Farmer, who has been put through her paces by Paramount scholastics and developed in no time into a full-fledged star, and Fred MacMurray, now at the top of the heap.

It took "The Barker," a stage play, to put the producer on the heels of Claudette Colbert. She signed a contract and was rushed to fame by a series of successful pictures. "Maid of Salem" is her latest picture.

In the early days Zukor sought names. Geraldine Farrar was summoned from the opera to make "Carmen" on the screen. John Barrymore, a matinee idol on Broadway, was transferred to the funny little studio in (Continued on page 118)

"A COLD"

Be doubly careful about the laxative you take!

WHAT is one of the most frequent questions the doctor asks when you have a cold? It is this—"Are your bowels regular?"

Doctors know how important a laxative is in the treatment of colds. They know, also, the importance of choosing the right laxative at this time. Before they will give any laxative their approval, they make doubly sure that it measures up to their own strict specifications.

Read these specifications. They are very important—not only during the "cold season," but all year 'round.

THE DOCTOR'S TEST OF A LAXATIVE:

It should be dependable.
It should be mild and gentle.
It should be thorough.
Its merit should be proven by test of time.
It should not form a habit.
It should not over-act.
It should not cause stomach pains.
It should not nauseate or upset digestion.

EX-LAX MEETS EVERY DEMAND

Ex-Lax checks on every single one of these 8 specifications . . . meets every demand so fairly that many doctors use Ex-Lax in their own homes for their own families.

For more than 30 years, mothers have recommended Ex-Lax to other mothers. And Ex-Lax has given complete satisfaction, not merely to thousands of families—but to millions. It has grown, slowly but surely, to the point where today it is used by more people than any other laxative in the whole wide world.

DISCOVER THE TRUTH FOR YOURSELF

Anyone who has ever used Ex-Lax can explain in a moment why Ex-Lax is so universally popular. It is thorough. But it is gentle. . . . It is effective. But it is mild. . . . It gives you the most effective relief you could ask for. But it spares you all discomfort. No nausea. No stomach pains. No weakness. That's why it is such a favorite not only of the grown-ups, but of the youngsters, as well.

EVERYONE LIKES THE TASTE OF EX-LAX

Perhaps you have been taking bitter "druggy" mixtures. . . . Then change to Ex-Lax, and find out how really pleasant a good laxative can be. For Ex-Lax tastes just like delicious chocolate. It pleases the children as well as the older folks.

All drug stores have Ex-Lax in 10c and 25c sizes. If you prefer, you may try it at our expense by simply mailing the coupon below for a free sample.

Instead of giving you the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 5★, extraordinary; 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

The movie industry demands "new faces" all the time, but does it do them justice in the long run? queries a reader.

$5.00 Prize Letter

But Do They Want "New Faces"?

The movie industry is the one industry whose doors are kept constantly open to newcomers; "new faces" are even demanded! Many times a young person wins his way to fame from absolute obscurity. The skyrocketing plane which Robert Taylor used as his passage to fame should certainly be ready for the use of some other young enthusiast.

During the past year there have been many newcomers on the screen, among them: Carol Hughes, Marsha Hunt, Robert Cummings, Owen Davis, Jr., Anne Nagel, Eleanore Whitney, etc. Although their first roles consisted only of the so-called "bits," they are gaining the notice of many movie fans. They received their opportunity through their ambition to work; they used the opportunity which has been given them to the best of their ability, then waited for the approval or disapproval of those patrons for whose commendation they have struggled so valiantly.

Here, however, lies the one factor which producers have overlooked; after the first appearances of their prodigies in minor parts of important pictures, they are given roles which are unimportant and unsuitable vehicles in which to star players who deserve more opportune roles to insure their futures. Certainly, this isn't the ultimate success to which their perseverance has guided them. Their careers are at a standstill; and those patrons who seemed so enthused about their appearances in first performances have evidently been unsatisfied with them in leading roles of "drab" pictures. I do not think producers should risk a great loss by financing their appearance in expensive films but there could be a more careful choice of roles to suit their personalities.—Ardith Rayevich, Wisner, Neb.

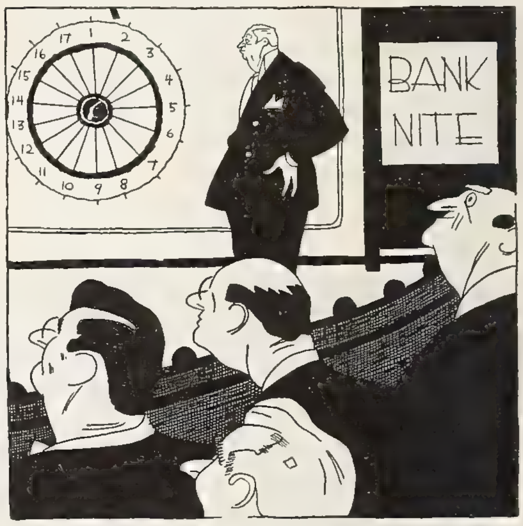
Do You Agree?

A theatre is no longer a theatre when it takes on "Bank Nights." Pictures were once considered a source of education and entertainment that proved profitable for fan and producer alike. Today, despite much public protest, they are rapidly becoming lottery houses.

This is the result: a constant buzz and hum of voices throughout the showing of the film, "Wonder if I'll win," "How much dough is in it," "Wish the darn picture was over—wanta see if I'm lucky," etc.

I, personally, much prefer paying my admission and seeing but one feature picture than seeing a double bill and having to contend with the noise and confusion that accompanies "Bank Nights." I say, put the picture first, forgetting the lottery scheme, and keep the confidence of the theatre patrons who appreciate good pictures.—Bernice Meehan, Indianapolis, Indiana.



Lottery schemes, such as "Bank Nights," have no place in theatres, argues an Indiana gal.

She Likes 'Em on the Air

If you can't see your favorite on the screen, the next best thing is to hear him or her. I have listened to Robert Taylor's thrilling voice come drifting right into my room and I felt that he was speaking only to me. I have heard Gable, Harlow, Bill Powell, Myrna Loy, Franchot Tone, and—well the list could go on and on. Why, I even like to hear people dance over the radio—Fred Astaire, Eleanor Powell, and Bill Robinson. With my imagination, I can see them strutting their stuff right in my living-room. Give me more stars on the air and the better I will like it. I'll sit back now quietly awaiting television.—Dontine Sligh, Darlington, S. C.

An Acute Attack of Tayloritis

You are my "Magnificent Obsession." But who am I? I am not a "Small Town Girl," I am not a "Gorgeous Hussy" and least of all I am not a "Times Square Lady" with the "Broadway Melody of 1936" at my heels. Then who am I? I am just one of several million young girls who walk this earth.

In my dreams I visualize you as a "Society Doctor," not as a sort of "Handy Andy" at a "Murder in the Fleet." Strange, but it is not only young girls who dream of you and admire you, but also young married women. Take, for instance, a friend of mine, "His Brother's Wife," who idolizes and praises you to the point where I'm afraid her husband is becoming jealous. I can continue for hours on end giving other cases quite similar to this.

I would love to have you as my "Private Number," (Continued on page 117)

"DIRT POCKETS" IN YOUR SKIN!

When Pores Become Clogged They Become Little "Dirt Pockets" and Produce Blackheads, Enlarged Pores, Muddy Skin and Other Blemishes!

By Lady Esther

When you do not cleanse your skin properly, every pore becomes a tiny "dirt pocket." The dirt keeps on accumulating and the pore becomes larger and larger and blackheads and muddy skin and other blemishes follow.

"But," you say, "it is impossible for 'dirt pockets' to form in my skin. I clean my skin every morning and every night." But, are you sure you really cleanse your skin, or do you only go through the motions?

Surface Cleansing Not Enough

Some methods, as much faith as you have in them, only give your skin a "lick-and-a-promise." They don't "houseclean" your skin, which is what is necessary.

What you want is deep cleansing! Many methods only "clean off" the skin. They do not clean it out! Any good housekeeper knows the difference.

What you want is a cream that does more than "grease" the surface of your skin. You want a cream that penetrates the pores! Such a cream, distinctly, is Lady Esther Face Cream. It is a cream that gets below the surface—into the pores.

Dissolves the Waxy Dirt

Gently and soothingly, it penetrates the tiny openings. There, it goes to work on the accumulated waxy dirt. It breaks up this grimy dirt—dissolves it—and makes it easily removable. All the dirt comes out, not just part of it!

As Lady Esther Face Cream cleanses the skin, it also lubricates it. It resupplies the skin with a fine oil that overcomes dryness and scaly patches and keeps the skin soft and smooth. So smooth, in fact, does it make the skin, that the skin takes powder perfectly without any preliminary "greasing."

Definite Results!

Lady Esther Face Cream will be found to be definitely efficient in the care of your skin. It will solve many of the complexion problems you now have.

But let a free trial prove this to you. Just send me your name and address and by return mail I'll send you a 7-days' tube. Then, see for yourself the difference it makes in your skin.

With the tube of cream, I'll also send you all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder. Clip the coupon now.

ROBERT TAYLOR 121 REQUESTS
SIMONE SIMON 106 REQUESTS
GENE AUTRY 104 REQUESTS
SHIRLEY TEMPLE 78 REQUESTS

Here's last month's mail-bag rating of your stars!

Information Desk

HERE ARE the biographies you have been clamoring for. Whether one is printed or not depends on the number of requests recorded for it. REMEMBER . . . every request counts . . . and mailing the little coupon on this page isn't just another way of satisfying idle curiosity. It's your way of telling Hollywood who's who on the screen. You're the public and you give the orders! So don't keep your flicker interests a deep dark secret.

SIMONE SIMON (First printing; total number of requests 239.) Those scholarly people, the biographers, will tell you that Simone Simon was born in very ordinary fashion some twenty-two years ago in the French seaport of Marseilles. Those of us of a more romantic twist will cling steadfastly to the theory that this capricious, impish, ageless Ariel is a changeling, abandoned by the fairy folk of Southern France to be brought up by human parents. And surely the girl's magical career, unfettered by space or time, dependent on chance and whim, rather than plan and effort, strengthens the belief. An education that started in Madagascar, whirled through Budapest, Turin, Berlin, terminating in Paris was supposedly the prelude for a career as a sculptress. But because she studied earnestly to be a sculptress, she turned out to be an artist at charcoal sketching, and because she could sketch, she became an actress. That's been life for Simone . . . a series of non sequiturs. It was Tourjansky, Russian refugee and eminent screen director, who captured the roving gamin for the screen. The story goes that he got slapped in the face for his pains. But only with the effect of confirming his opinion that Simone was the girl to play the role of Pierrette in "Chanteur Inconnu." The first hurdle to threaten Simone's spritely stride was Hollywood. A social hurdle. The smart set refused to accept her, put her down for an arrant poseur. Simone wanted to leave. But her success in "Girl's Dormitory" has changed the attitude of movietown's fickle great. They've taken her up now. They idolize the cute face with the funny little nose and the freckles galore, the moods that alternately becloud and lavish it with sunshine. So far, Simone remains among the list of screenland's eligible maidens. Maybe not so eligible. Perchance she abides the time when Oberon will come swooping out of his midsummer night's dream to snatch her back to the spirit realm. The next Simone Simon picture is a revival of "Seventh Heaven," in which Simone will play the Gaynor role. Jimmy Stewart will be her Charlie Farrell.

MAUREEN FINNEGAN, Salt Lake City, Utah: Gene Autry's steadily increasing popularity is dependent to a large extent on his fine voice. Statistics show that last year, for every Bing Crosby record that was sold, three Autry records were disposed of.

CARMELE RICCO, Cape May, New Jersey—Yes, Shirley Temple did learn some Chinese for her role in "Stowaway." Four hundred words, to be exact. She not only learned it but taught it . . . to the extras who spoke nothing but the Cantonese dialect. Shirley, you see, speaks pure Mandarin, the language of the court.

If you would like to see a brief synopsis of your favorite's life in this department, fill in and send us the coupon on this page. And look—how about saving yourself 2c by pasting your request on one of Uncle Sam's penny postcards? General questions, of course, will also be answered here. If your question is not taken care of here, look for it in your mail box. Address: The Information Desk, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

SPENCER TRACY (First printing; total number of requests 249.) You expect of the life story of Spencer Tracy a smash bang account of what happens when a dynamite temperament clashes with the hard-boiled world. Lotsa fireworks. And your guess is all cockeyed . . . because Spencer finished sowing his wild Irish oats when he was a kid. Adolescence past, his temperament began to mean stage and screen dividends . . . no more shenanigans. No more exploits like being A. W. O. L. days on end so's he could play with his pals, "Mousie" and "Rattie," spawn of the local saloon keeper. Or trying to join the Marines at seventeen during the War. Of course, they rejected him. So he joined the Navy instead . . . and fought the war at Norfolk, Virginia. Retired a while later on a pension of thirty dollars a month, he rounded off his much neglected education with two years at Ripon College in Wisconsin. He might have stayed longer, only a sudden attack of stage fever carried him off to a New York dramatic school. For a time he lived on his pension . . . like a lord . . . acting, acting, and regaling himself three times a day on bread and water, with an occasional cup of coffee on Sundays. The luxury palled, and Spencer landed a job with the Theater Guild . . . acting job, by the way, even though some snobbish critic claimed that he "looked like he had been picked up by the property man." Stock in Cincinnati, White Plains, Grand Rapids, and Brooklyn groomed Tracy for a second Broadway experience, this time without the grapefruit oblation from the critics. Hollywood's first "come hither" followed his smash success as Killer Mears in "The Last Mile."

$2,000,000 is the rumored sum Columbia spent to film the fanciful magnificence of this world-famous book. This gorgeous reproduction of the lamasery of Shangri-La (above) seems to confirm this estimate.

Capra Captures Top Screen Honors With "LOST HORIZON"

By RUSSELL PATTERSON

THAT man Capra has done it again! And when I say "again" I don't mean that his new Columbia picture is just as good as "Mr Deeds", "It Happened One Night", etc. I mean it's better! "Lost Horizon" is so magnificent artistically and so gripping dramatically that it stands practically alone on my private and unofficial recommended list for the month. I know you've heard about this famous James Hilton best-seller and its unique story of a secret romantic paradise on the roof of the world So I don't have to tell you what a stupendous job it was to reproduce this fabulous Oriental "hideout" on the screen, and to portray the amazing romance that takes place within its walls. But Columbia, Capra and Colman have done it—done it so superbly that for my money "Lost Horizon" is going to be one of those talked-about pictures that everybody just has to see. The star rôle is the best thing I've seen Ronald Colman do, and the supporting efforts of Edward Everett Horton, Margo, H. B. Warner, Jane Wyatt and thousands of others, plus Robert Riskin's exciting adaptation, all go to make "Lost Horizon" a big picture in every sense of the word. I'm telling you—don't miss it!

PRISONER in a barbaric paradise, Conway is torn between the bonds of civilization and love of his fascinating captor.

DEATH waits outside the mystery plane grounded in a secret corner of the earth from which no man has ever escaped.

FASCINATING FACTS ABOUT "LOST HORIZON"

- It was two years in the making
- The cast numbers 1150
- Two complete towns were erected for the production
- One set alone took 150 men two months to build
- Book translated in 14 languages

KIDNAPING an unknown lover (Ronald Colman) from the other side of the earth, Sondra (Jane Wyatt) imprisons him in her fabulous Oriental "hideout" on the roof of the world.

Why I Require my Fashion Mannequins to wear Woodbury's Facial Powder!

BY
MAGGY ROUFF

The lovely Anne Lecler, one of the mannequins in Maggy Rouff's Paris fashion salon.

"A FASHION MODEL must have a lovely complexion as well as a lithe and beautiful figure. So I take the precaution to have all my mannequins use only Woodbury's Facial Powder.

"This powder has la qualité de soie . . . it is like silk, and clings to the skin even in the warmth and glare of the spotlight. The shades wed the healthy undertones of the skin, giving the complexion both chic and allure.

"But it is equally important that Woodbury's Powder is germ-free*. For one of my mannequins to appear at a Fashion Opening with a blemish on her face . . . that would be affaire fatale. No blemish-germs can be transferred to the skin from this famous powder."

All 6 Woodbury shades are divinely flattering. If you're fair, "Light Rachel" is your shade. "Radiant" is the favorite of medium blondes. "Brunette" is stunning for the darker skin. $1.00, 50¢, 25¢, 10¢.

Tested with 19 other leading brands, Woodbury's Facial Powder, alone, was germ-free both before and after use.

Here's a New Knitting

Now you can knit your dress by a pattern, exactly as you would sew a cloth one! Improves your skill, too

5689—This smart two-piece knit model is exclusive to MODERN SCREEN'S readers. It is an ideal type of costume for wear as a first spring suit. Note the raised panel detail.

ALL YOU ardent knitters are going to bless us for introducing to you this new knitting service which takes all the errors out of home knitting. A famous yarn company has had the brilliant idea of giving an actual knitting pattern with its designs. By using it not only for the knitting of the garment but for the blocking, too, you achieve a hand-knit costume that has the finish and smartness of the most expensive hand-knit garment you could buy in a store or shop.

This pattern is printed on a sturdy paper that will not tear. It looks exactly like the average dress pattern with separate divisions for each part of the garment. Every cast-on, increase, decrease, bind-off, pocket and buttonhole, in fact, any style point, is clearly defined and the instructions given at the point of the garment it should be, in order that the garment when finished will be the perfectly styled and fitting one you want. Every minute detail of the knitting instructions are printed right on the pattern for you to follow step by step.

Here are a few of the features of this splendid pattern: Guesswork is eliminated. It is possible for the knitter to get more style detail. Blocking is made simple and certain. Trips to an instructress or knitting shop for instructions are unnecessary. A custom-made fit is procured. Every stitch is indicated. And it guards against loss of time through unsuccessful garments.

THE blocking stretch allowance has been carefully figured so that each garment, when it is finished and blocked to fit your pattern, will fit you as a custom-made garment.

Suit number 5689, so smartly designed in two-piece style, is made in a special sports type of Shetland yarn. It is just the right weight for wear under a coat while it is still cold and later as a spring suit. The top can be used with other skirts as an attractive sweater topper. This pattern comes in standard sizes from 12-20.

6031—Another exclusive knit style in a combination of two beautiful yarns. Novel check design in the knit.

ANOTHER two-piece model is number 6031. This is knitted in Spanish yarn combined with De Lustra Crepe. The skirt, knitted in a check design of knit and purl, is of solid color—while the blouse combines the two yarns, using the color of the skirt in combination with a blending shade of the De Lustra Crepe.

The style is youthful, especially with the high neckline and button front detail similar to the popular cardigan sweater. This pattern also comes in standard sizes from 12-20.

And here's another point. If any of you feel that you do not want the pattern and would prefer to have the direction sheets you have had heretofore, you may have the privilege of sending for them instead. Merely check on the coupon shown on page 22 which you prefer. And remember that you enclose fifty cents if you want the pattern—one dollar if you want both patterns—but only a stamped, self-addressed envelope if you want the directions. Don't forget the difference in the two—and it is a big difference since one is an actual dress pattern and the other only the sheets of typed knitting directions you have been used to receiving.

Top of page, left, Hollywood's most romantic pair are snapped in an intimate moment during Dolores Del Rio's Charity Party at the Cocoanut Grove. Barbara Stanwyck adjusts Bob Taylor's dinner jacket, much to his apparent delight. Who said they'd ever fallen out of love, huh?

Left, Myrna Loy and Clark Gable appear to be absorbed completely by either Cameraman Muto or an offside guest at the party. Mr. Gable seems to be proving something with his rather unconventional get-up for such a gala event. Myrna, on the other hand, is the "nth" in smartness.

Above, just by way of a different entrance onto the Grove dance floor, Binnie Barnes lets two willing swains whisk her over the balustrade! And some fun, too, according to the English star's wide smile.

"Dishing up the dirt" in a big way are Virginia Bruce and Joan Bennett. Let's hope it isn't a panning for some of the other gals at the party. After all, you two, it was a charity affair, remember? Maybe it's a new joke, judging by the mischievous Bennett expression.

Say, Ruby Keeler, three's a crowd, you know, when you're out with newlyweds! Dick Powell, sans his moustache, enters the party with wife, Joan Blondell, on one arm and Ruby Keeler Jolson on the other. Al Jolson made it a quartette, but he must have been checking his hat.

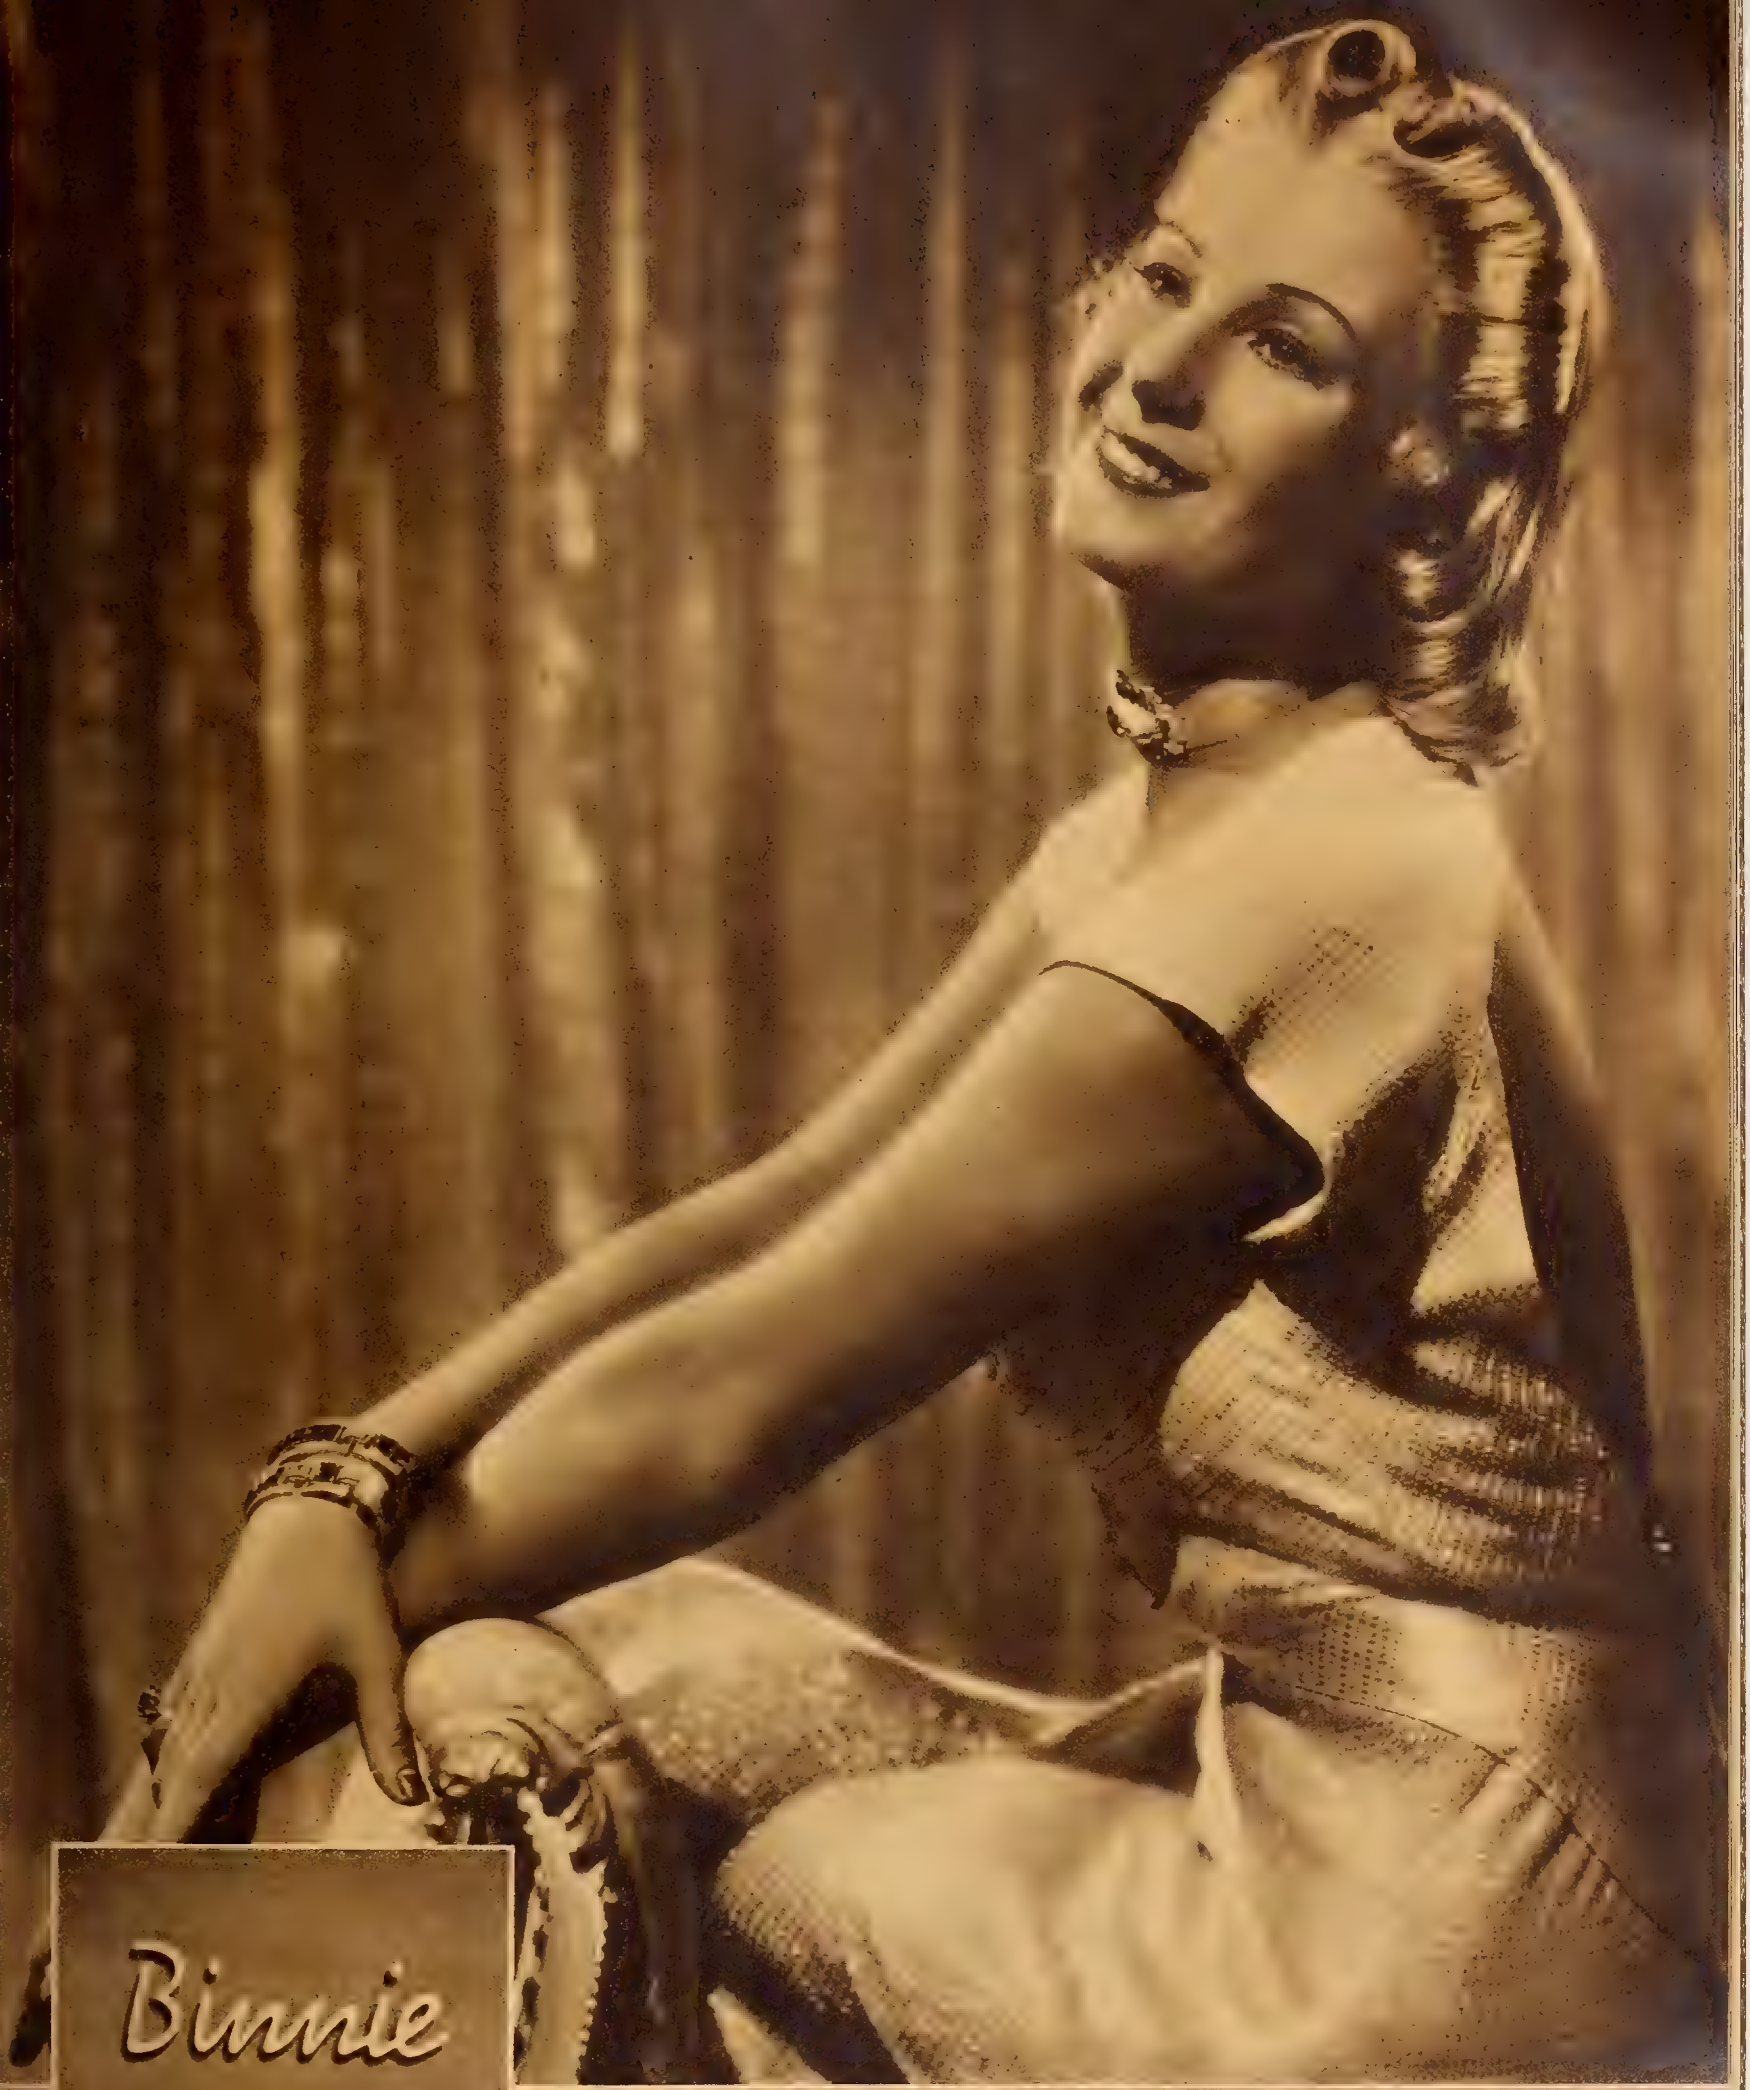
Shirley Temple

Dressed fetchingly in her Sunday best velvet and lace, Shirley poses for a New Year's portrait. A little taller but not a whit more grown-up the screen's favorite child holds fast to all her baby charm of curls and dimples. After "Stowaway," the next two Temple pictures will deal with characters beloved of childhood. One is "Wee Willie Winkie" and the other "Heidi," that delightful story of the little Swiss girl who lived high in the Alps. You'll adore her in these.

Jimmy Ellison

Meet a chap that you fans had a hand in raising to unexpected popularity. Jimmy had hardly put his feet in the stirrups of the "Hopalong Cassidy" Westerns before his studio began to get requests for more of that good-looking Ellison boy. And so fast has he ridden along that after making "The Plainsman" with Gary Cooper, he was presented with a fat seven years' contract from the producer of the "Hopalong" pictures. He has the lead in the seventh one, called "Trail Dust."

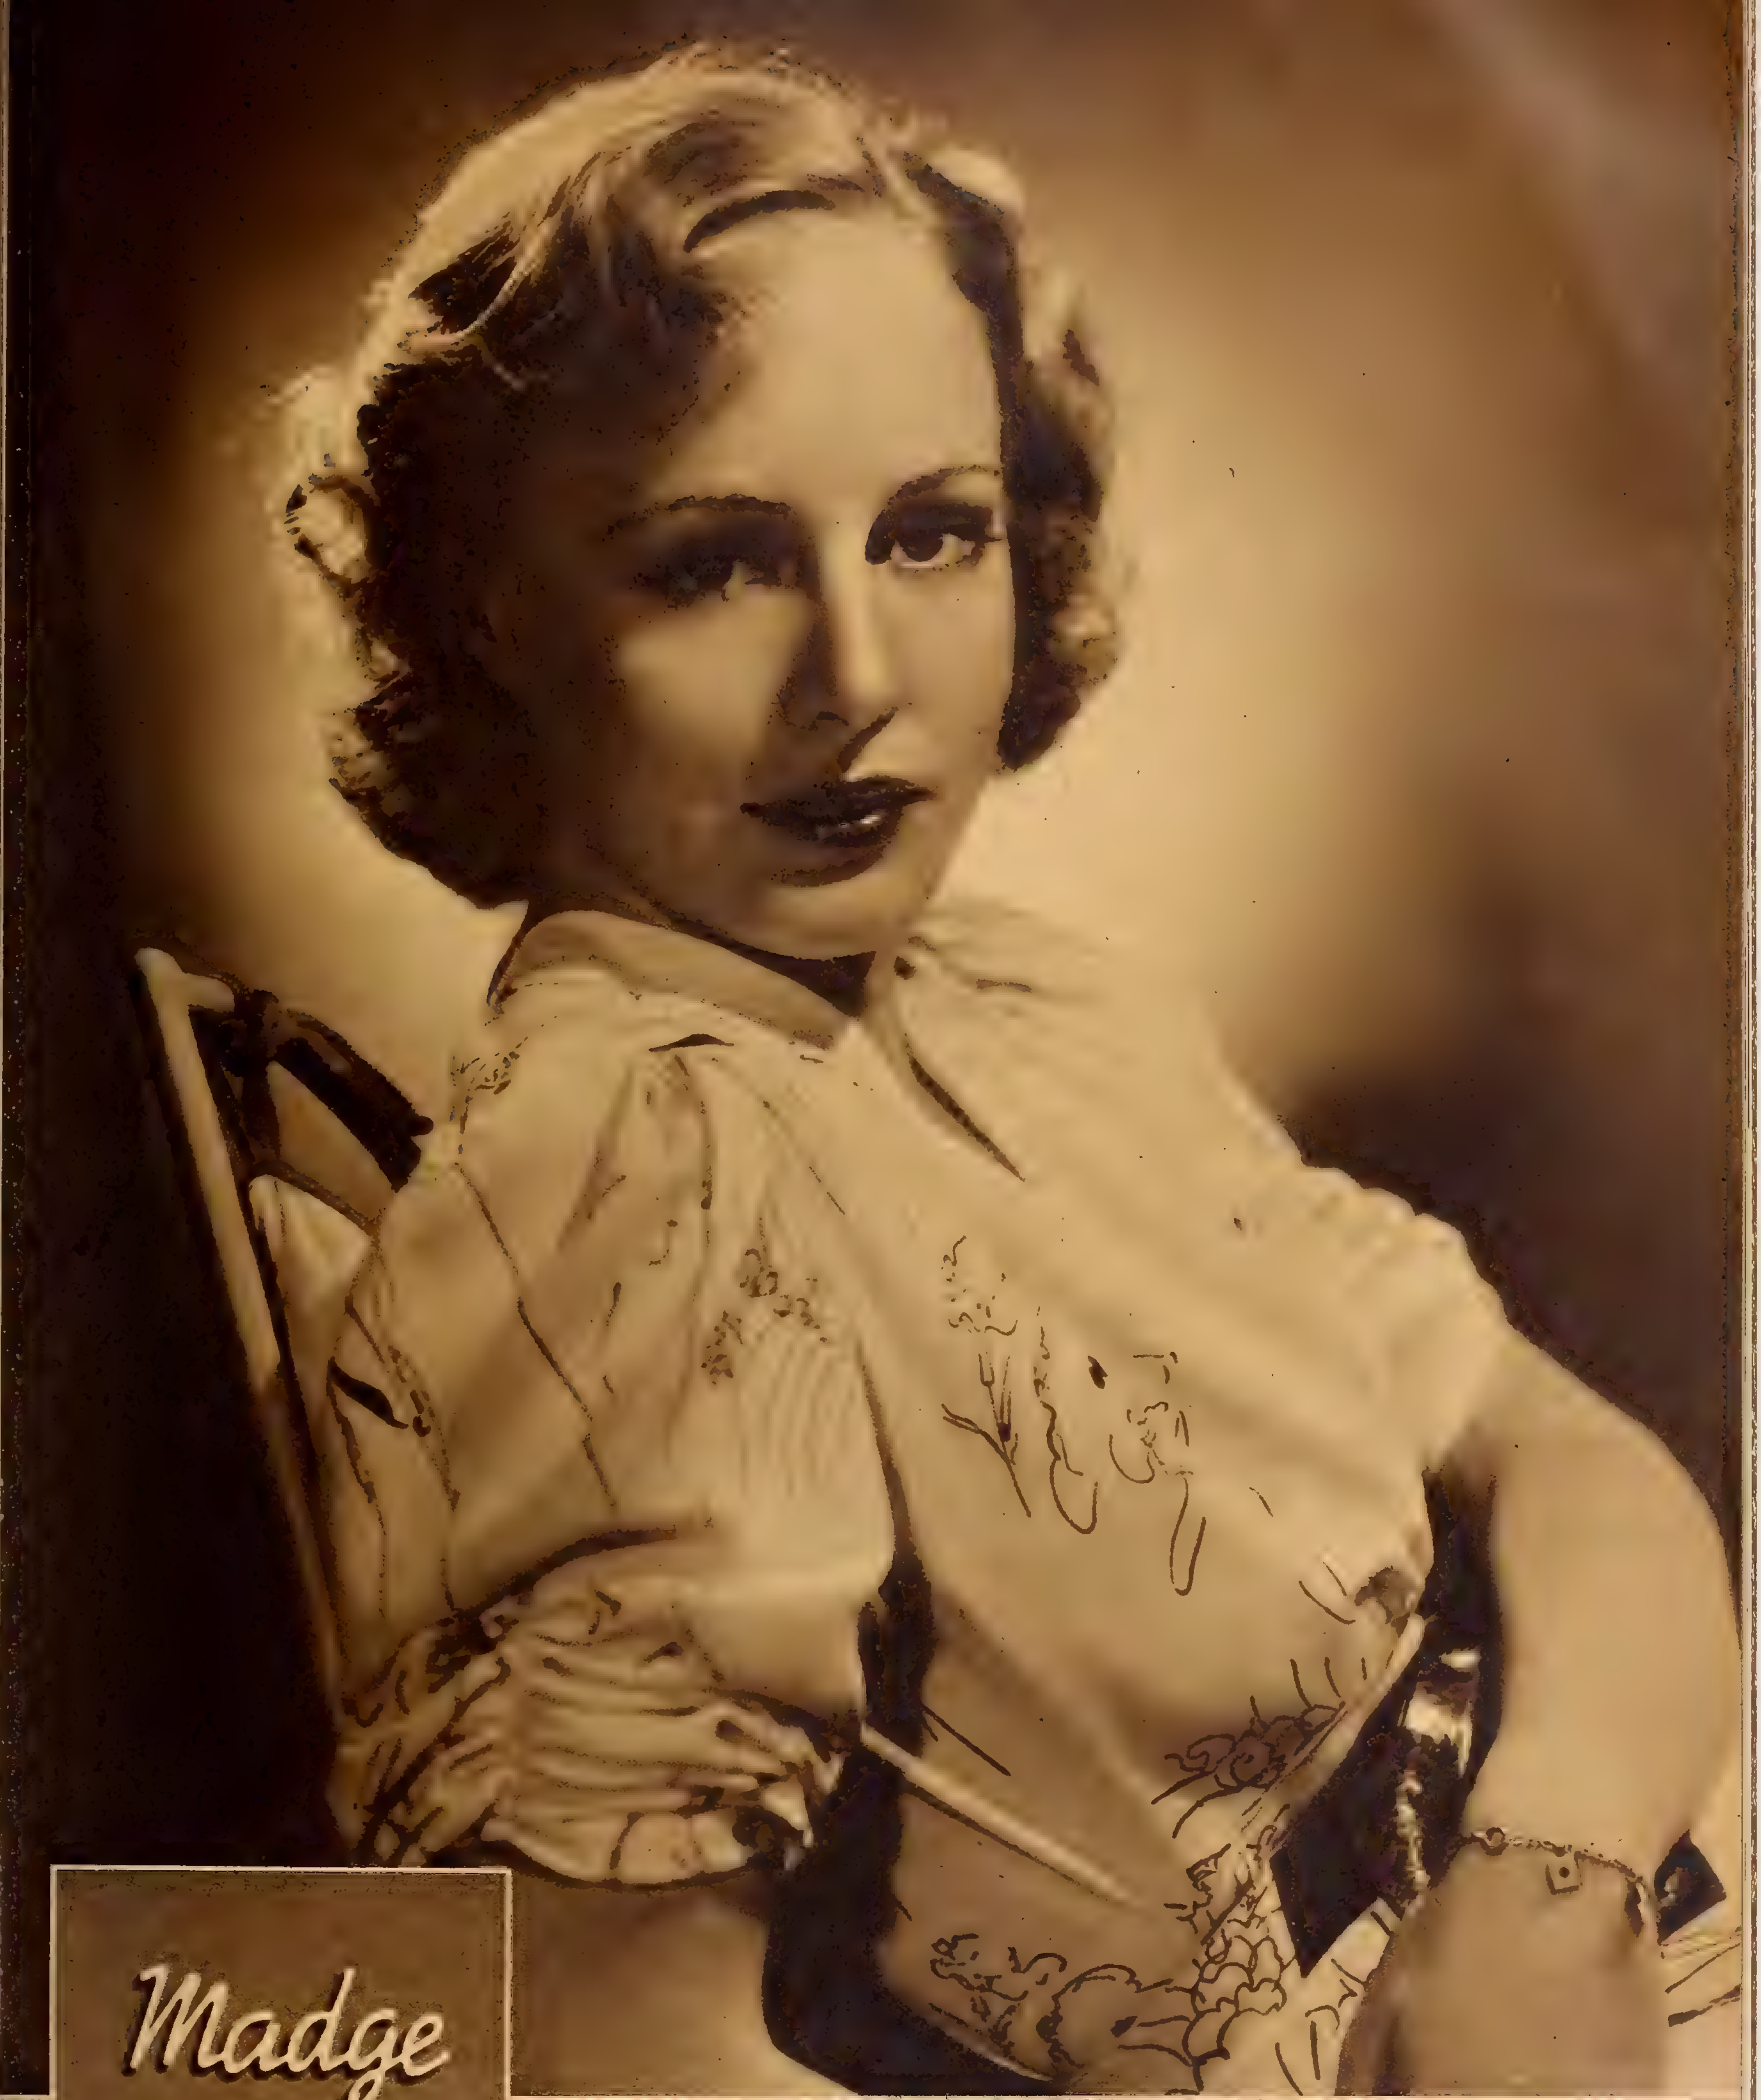


Binnie Barnes

Binnie, a forthright English lass if there ever was one, seems to be edging in on the glamor girls—what with the fascinating new hair-do and all. A great favorite in England, she has won a big following over here and seems to be a permanent addition to the Hollywood English colony and our screen. You recently have seen her in "Three Smart Girls" and now she is busy with "Delay in the Sun" for Universal in which she has Alice Brady and Cesar Romero as acting partners.

James Stewart

Young Mr. Stewart has every reason to look so contented, for he's just about the busiest fellow in town. He's a runner-up on the Taylor big-time popularity and off-screen he's just about Hollywood's Beau No. 1! Finishing "Born to Dance" with Eleanor Powell, James hurried into the Myrna Loy-Bill Powell return engagement of "After the Thin Man." And with hardly more than a few hours frivolity at the Troc, he plunged into "The Foundry," Jean Harlow's newest M-G-M picture.



Madge Evans

Here's a New Year's toast to Madge and a wish that she may have the breaks she so rightfully deserves on the screen in 1937! An able comedienne and a skillful actress, she isn't seen half often enough to suit her many devoted fans. Maybe Madge should go a bit temperamental and insist upon more roles like the one in "Piccadilly Jim" and the more recent "Pennies from Heaven," in which she is Bing Crosby's important heart interest. Tom Gallery is her real romance.

Olivia de Havilland

There's little time in the de Havilland life for such reposing as this! Even a brief holiday in New York for the opening of "Charge of the Light Brigade" turned out to be a duty, for poor Olivia was besieged by press and fans every minute. On the other hand, it must give her a lot of satisfaction to think how quickly success has come. "Call It a Day," the popular stage play, will be her next—Ian Hunter her co-star.

1. Death for several of the screen's best-known figures.
2. Separation and divorce of several top stars.
3. Three "big name" marriages.
4. Garbo: No marriage; death of a near and loved one; ill health.
5. Clark Gable: Domestic unhappiness (Dareos advised against divorce); serious accident late in year.
6. Norma Shearer: Must guard Thalberg's health; will make greatest picture.
7. Shirley Temple: Danger of kidnap threats.
8. Ginger Rogers: Professional separation from Fred Astaire.
9. Claudette Colbert: Lovely romance with medical man.
10. Myrna Loy: Great romance in 1936.
11. John Barrymore: Faced with menace of serious ill health.
12. Mary Pickford: Romance and likely marriage to Buddy Rogers.

ONCE MORE, for the fifth consecutive year in MODERN SCREEN, Dareos, that kingpin of Hollywood astrologers, looks to the planets and his charts, and gives you his 1937 forecast for Hollywood and its great ones.

For the past four years, he has achieved the remarkable record of a more-than-80-per-cent accuracy score in his Hollywood predictions. This year, he again prophesies strange things — sorrows and happinesses, tragedies and successes, scandals and threats, deaths and births, grief and joy.

For sorrowing Norma Shearer, more sorrow! Clouds, too, for the Bennett sisters; more trouble for Mary Astor; clouds for Dick Powell and Joan Blondell and for Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond; sorrows for Maureen O'Sullivan; scandal and gossip menace Claudette Colbert, Gary Cooper and others.

But, wait, this 1937 peep by Dareos isn't all blue and grey. He foresees great happiness for Barbara Stanwyck and Bob Taylor. He sees betrothal for Janet Gaynor, a brilliant love year for George Brent, marriage for Alice Faye. Sorrow for Garbo, marriage for Jean Harlow and Bill Powell, no marriage for Clark Gable and Carole Lombard.

All these things, and many others, the planets hold in store for 1937, claims Dareos. However, he agrees with all recognized astrologers that "The stars incline, but do not compel." Tragedy and sorrow may be averted by steadfast courage and care. When he foretells grief for an individual, he hopes he can be proved

What Actually Came to Pass

1. The passing of Jack Gilbert, Irving Thalberg, Henry Walthall.
2. Clark Gable, Ginger Rogers, Barbara Stanwyck, Arline Judge.
3. Dick Powell and Joan Blondell; Claudette Colbert; Myrna Loy; Fred MacMurray.
4. True. Irving Thalberg was closer to Garbo than any other person in Hollywood. Her health is very bad today.
5. Domestic unhappiness revealed with separation but no divorce. No accident yet.
6. The death of Irving Thalberg. "Romeo and Juliet" is her greatest picture.
7. True. The Government has placed Shirley under guard.
8. This has been under discussion. However, Dareos says 1937 planets show they will continue as a team.
9. Claudette married Dr. Joel Pressman.
10. Myrna married Arthur Hornblow.
11. True. Barrymore often hospitalized during past year.
12. All signs point to a Pickford-Rogers marriage very, very soon.

wrong—he hopes that that which the planets threaten may not come to pass.

Here is his forecast for 1937:

GENERAL: Death waits for five big names in Hollywood! Death will strike suddenly at a figure as famous and as great as was Irving Thalberg, and, again, the industry will mourn the sudden passing of one of its leaders. Two great stars enter the year under the threat of death, and two of the best-known directors will not live through the year.

Babies will be born to three of the foremost stars of the screen in 1937. There will be at least one adoption by one of the top ten stars, perhaps two of the leaders will adopt babies.

Even more scarlet than some of 1936's scandal threats, Hollywood faces the danger of additional lurid headlines. Spies, wiretappers, dirt-mongers will be at work in Hollywood more than ever before, Dareos warns. If there is dirt to be dug up, it will be dug up—and plastered across yellow headlines. Big names are threatened.

Yet, 1937 will not be a year of scandalous divorce. The divorce rate that has gained Hollywood a somewhat unsavory repute will drop in 1937. The marriage rate will go up.

Color will come to the screen with a great rush, and, by the time 1937 wanes, the early doom of black-and-white pictures will be certain.

In a business way, the new year bears great promise. Box office tills will overflow. New producing companies will be formed, and several of Hollywood's biggest studios will merge. Despite foreign progress, Hollywood's supremacy in pictures will never be threatened.

Accidents threaten several stars, and Dareos fears a major air disaster which will involve not one, but several of the screen's stars.

And now for your favorite stars:

NORMA SHEARER: Despite her present wish to make no more pictures, Norma will change her mind and go on to renewed artistic success for at least two more years. She will make three more fine pictures—possibly more. Yet, the shadow of sorrow is still upon her;

SHE TELLS ON Garbo

GARBO MADE me what I am today. She is responsible for my being on the screen.

"I'd thought of becoming a movie actress when I was in high school. I suppose almost all girls brought up in Hollywood think about it. Then I saw Garbo on the screen. I saw her again and again and again. I knew that I would have to follow in her footsteps, however humbly I might walk.

"And so I started in. I was just sixteen when I signed with Central Casting. I got extra work to do. One day a casting director noticed me and offered me a screen test. I guess it was successful because I became a 'heroine' in several Western pictures. I played opposite George O'Brien, Buck Jones, Ken Maynard, Rex Bell and others. I made 'Jungle Mystery,' 'Lost Special,' 'Tombstone Canyon,' 'Secret Sinners' and others. In 1934, I was co-starred in 'High School Girl.' Then M-G-M signed me to a long-term contract. Shortly thereafter they needed a blonde girl who resembled Greta Garbo enough to play her sister in 'The Painted Veil.'

"Just imagine—you girls in your teens—how you would feel if you were told, suddenly, that you were to work with Garbo. Why, if anyone had intimated that when I was in high school a few years ago (I went to Hollywood High and the Convent of the Immaculate Heart), I would have thought he had gone completely insane.

"It was the most thrilling thing that ever happened to me, except," said Cecilia, in her quietly dignified little way, "of course, love."

"She didn't talk to me very much. She doesn't talk to anyone very much. She doesn't need to. Which is one of the many things I learned from her—how much time and energy most of us waste in silly chatter that means nothing. There is something more potent in Garbo's silence than in the words most of us pour forth in a week. Hers are what my mother calls 'telling silences.'

"Garbo taught me the great beauty of silence.

"Garbo and I did have one conversation. It was about mountains. I happened to be saying that I have a little cabin up in the hills where I like to go off by myself. Garbo overheard me and said that she loves mountains, too. She told me what they mean to her—grandeur and everlasting patience and a dwarfing of the silly frets and fevers of little human beings.

"I think that she was, unconsciously, describing herself in a symbolical way. There is something cool and remote and unassailable about her that does dwarf the frets and fevers of most of us.

"I'd just been a little girl full of crazy notions when I started to work with her. I'd had most of the usual fantastic ideas. I thought I should act sort of temperamental, thinking it made an impression. I took on, unconsciously and sometimes a little consciously, the mannerisms and characteristics of stars on the screen. I thought it was all right to be late on the set now and then. I'd seen some stars keep a company waiting for an hour or more and thought it indicated a certain superiority, a defiance of rules and regulations which are just for 'ordinary people,' not actresses.

"Garbo taught me to be myself, to behave according to the dictates of my own nature. She taught me that to be true to yourself is to be not only a great artist but also a great human being.

"She is so simply, starkly herself that once you have come in contact with her any little affectation or pose which you may have acquired seems cheap and rather tawdry by comparison.

"It wasn't really me to put on airs, to be excitable and fluttery, to be late when I'd been brought up to respect punctuality. I hate crowds. I never go to big parties. I don't even like double dates. I really could say 'I tank I go home' myself—and mean it. In fact, I often do. But most girls experiment with themselves for a time, try different airs and graces and poses, as they try on clothes. It's all right if the airs and graces don't stick and become a part of you.

"She taught me not to borrow from other people. She taught me not to borrow their mannerisms, their eccentricities, their fads, any more than I would borrow their clothes, their cars, their jewels and keep them for myself.

"Garbo is always on time on the set—to the minute. She would make anyone else seem pretty silly if he were not at least equally prompt.

By James Reid

It's only taken a few pictures to make Don Ameche one of the coming stars of the screen. In "One in a Million," he plays with Sonja Henie. Here they are in a scene from the picture. This is the screen debut of the skating star.

One in a Million!

THE YOUNG lawyer in the Minnesota town looked up, as his door opened, to see a tall, good-looking, smiling foreigner, dressed—a bit self-consciously—in his Sunday best.

"What can I do for you?" he asked.

The young foreigner took the proffered chair, sitting on the edge of it. Still smiling, but twisting his hat in his hands nervously, he said, "I want to do something about my name."

"You mean you want to change it?"

"No, no," his protest was earnest. He searched for words to express himself. "I—I want to make it easier to say—more American."

"What is your name?"

"Amici." He spelled it out for the lawyer. "My American friends, they have trouble saying it." He smiled apologetically.

"So you want to spell it the way it sounds?"

"Si." In his excited gratitude at being understood so quickly, he lapsed into his native Italian.

"Well, I think that can be arranged simply enough."

The attorney reached in a desk drawer for legal papers, to draw up a court petition. A half-hour later, it was finished. His new client sighed with relief, and prepared to leave.

"By the way," the lawyer asked, as he shook hands, "what does your name mean in Italian?"

"Friend," said the young foreigner.

And that's how tall, good-looking Don Ameche came to have that unusual last name.

What's in a name? The answer, in the case of the screen's new Latin lover, is: "Everything." To know him is to think of him as a friend. And because of the people who have thought of him as a friend, he is what he is today.

It's quite a story.

The young foreigner—who changed "Amici" to "Ameche" to make it easier for Americans to say, was destined to be Don's father.

Felix Ameche was born "a little north of Rome." In his teens, he came to this country. He worked in mills, mines, section gangs. Gradually learning the language, he drifted westward until finally he saw the Wisconsin-Minnesota country.

There he fell in love with an American-born girl who was partly German and partly Scotch-Irish, with the German predominant. They married, when he had enough money saved. They set up housekeeping in Kenosha, Wisconsin, thirty-six miles down Lake Michigan from Milwaukee. There, their children were born.

Eight children, in all. Four boys and four girls. The first was a girl. The second was a boy—they called him Dominic.

Schoolmates later shortened that to "Dom." But who ever heard of such a name as "Dom"? Boys, who didn't know his full name, called him "Don." He ended by calling himself that. It simplified matters and it saved explanations.

Prosperity, as well as children, came to the Ameches. Felix Ameche was in business for himself now. He owned two saloons in Kenosha; later, before Prohibition came along and retired him, he had a third—in La Salle, Illinois.

As Harlow Sees Herself

By Caroline S. Hoyt

Jean Harlow's screen personality is quite different from her off-screen self. The hard-boiled, knock-'em-down-and-drag-'em-out gal of "Libeled Lady" is sensitive in real life. Left, a scene from the picture, with Spencer Tracy. And right, Jean has few intimate friends—Bill Powell is one of them. Snapped together at the Troc.

Would you deliberately show yourself up? Jean does—and openly, too

WELL, OF COURSE," said Jean, when I asked her to look at herself in the mirror and tell me, honestly, what she saw there, "there is, first of all, the little matter of my face not matching. It might not have made any difference to Harlean Carpenter of Kansas, but it's something of a problem to the girl they now call Jean Harlow. I suppose there is such a girl," laughed Jean, "but, to tell you the simple, honest truth, I feel as detached from her as do the fans who see her on the screen.

"I'm afraid to tell how I really see myself," said Jean, "because if I let myself go, if I really do tell the truth, the whole truth, no one will believe it. I will be suspected of false modesty, of excessive self-pity, of looking for sympathy.

"But you've asked and I may as well run the whole gauntlet, let the consequences fall where they may. To begin with:

"I have no chin to speak of.

"My eyes are set too deep in their sockets.

"My nose doesn't belong to my face at all. When noses were shuffled and dealt out, I drew somebody else's.

"I have a nice skin but mainly because I take extremely good care of it. If I didn't, it would blister, burn, turn red or do something silly. I can't take sun-baths and get nice tans like other girls. No, I just plain scorch.

"And my figure is just one of those things; you may assume that all I have to do is enter a little shoppe and throw on a frock and there I am. Nothing could be "wronger." Because my figure is all wrong. It is not an easy figure to dress. It

"I'm afraid to tell how I really see myself," said When noses were shuffled and dealt out, I drew is all wrong. It is not an easy figure to dress. It takes planning and scheming and mathematical calculation. Ask Adrian, he'll tell you! When I diet, I am to thin. When I don't diet, I resemble an hourglass. My shoulders are too broad and too square. My hips are too broad. Midway between the two is my waist and it is excessively and unfortunately small. And the sum total is the hourglass ensemble, if I am not very careful. I have to be sure that the neckline of every gown I wear is just so, or the whole effect is thrown out of line and the breadth and squareness of my shoulders emphasized.

"My legs are—well, all right, I suppose, as legs go. You may have observed, though, that I never wear short skirts.

"It is a figure I have to work with and dress toward, so to speak."

I looked at Jean as she talked with something like pity in my heart. Poor child, I thought, she believes all this. I considered the indisputable fact that artists always paint unflattering self-portraits. They tend to caricature themselves. It is the innate modesty, I suppose, of the sensitive soul which feels itself such an atom in time and space.

I kept on looking at Jean. I marveled marvelously, yet again, at the self-depreciatory trait in one who might well plume herself like the Bird of Paradise, sail triumphantly, a white swan, upon the pellucid waters of self-esteem. Jean, seated on a jade green divan in her dressing-room, clad in a smart black satin frock, draped in silver foxes, wearing a small, tall black satin hat with a fan-shaped, stiff black veil, a black halo, framing a face the texture and color of white silk. Well, the Jean mine eyes beheld did most outrageously give the lie to the Jean mine ears heard.

But Jean, sensing my incredulity, said, "You don't have to see me when I get up in the morning; but I have to see myself!

"You see," she went on earnestly, sitting now, small-girl fashion on the very edge of the divan, "there are two outstanding truths about the person I really am. The first of these truths is that my professional personality is a role I have assumed.

"The second truth is that I am eaten alive by an inferiority complex. A common complaint, I know, a sort of adult measles. But I have an uncommon case of it.

Fastest Gal in Town

Nimble-toed and nimble-witted—that's Eleanore Whitney

By Lois Svensrud

Eleanore Whitney has the art of tapping down to a fine point. Her record is sixty taps in four seconds!

Johnny Downs is Eleanore's favorite date these days.

SHE'S NOT only the fastest girl in town, but she's broken a world's speed record. Eleanore Whitney can do sixty taps in four seconds!

"That's what they tell me," admitted Eleanore, her brown eyes sparkling at the mention of the Whitney record. "But I really don't know how I got that way. It's just a difference in people, I guess. Some think faster. I'm faster on my feet."

If you had dropped into Paramount's commissary on this particular day, it's ten to one you would have guessed Eleanore was a high school girl cutting classes to lunch at the studio. For one thing, she was dressed in the plainest of tweed skirts and a matching brown sweater, with a polka dot scarf knotted at the neck. Lipstick was her only make-up. For another thing, she was watching the "celebrities," just as eagerly as any visitor to any studio commissary.

"Look," she whispered, "here comes Carole Lombard. She's always been my idea of what glamor ought to look like. And here I am, working on the very same lot with her!"

And that's Eleanore Whitney. In spite of several years in the theatrical world and a year in Hollywood, she's less sophisticated than most eighteen-year-olds. She hasn't a touch of that pseudo-sophistication acquired so quickly by the majority of girls who have once been behind a footlight or in front of a camera.

With a little help from the make-up and publicity departments, one would think that this girl's natural poise and prettiness could be turned into celluloid glamor. But the glamor gals couldn't so easily acquire what Eleanore has. Call it sparkle, call it verve, call it just plain joy of living. Whatever it is, she radiates with it. "I get a kick out of everything that happens to me," is the way she puts it.

"And things always are happening to me," Eleanore added with a giggle. "Out on the lot they all say, 'What's happened to Whitney to day?' I seem to be pursued by a jinx as far as pictures are concerned. Something's happened to me in every one of the six pictures I've been in. You see, I'm good at the taps, but I'm simply swell at the tumbles."

Luise Rainer, on the screen or off, is always fascinating.

Miss Rainer Regrets

Few stars would have the courage to speak their minds as Luise does in this analysis of herself and Hollywood

By Nanette Kutner

Here is Luise as O-lan opposite Paul Muni's Wang in "The Good Earth."

This impulsive Viennese star deeply regrets her separation from the man she loves, Clifford Odets, dramatist.

FRANKLY, Luise Rainer regrets the whole business. She regrets being separated from the man she loves. She regrets the ruthless methods of our reporters, the coldness of our celebrity-chasers, the terrific power of the cutting-room and the down-to-earth logic of American men. She regrets her five-year movie contract. She regets the impulsiveness that drives her, willy-nilly, into such jams. She regrets having to stay away from the legitimate stage, practically a prisoner, albeit a high-priced one, bound by California's studios. But most of all—she regrets living in Hollywood.

"Hollywood is dead," she told me. "Everything about it is dead, even the beautiful hills."

She pointed to where they rose, green and sandy and hazy purple, pointed straight from the living-room of her Brentwood house that seems to be set down right in the middle of them.

She said, "I look at those hills. I know they are beautiful, and I ask myself what is it I don't like, and the answer is . . . they are dead. The air surrounding them is heavy, not like mountain air. There is no exhilaration, no sparkle. The people here are like that, too, all impersonal, all cold, with no feeling.

"I often go for walks in the hills. This not easy because Hollywood people never walk. Walking is such a personal matter, so Hollywood rides . . . like corpses they ride. By riding they can keep away from life. Walking is too human, too close to the earth, too near other people, the little everyday people . . . the real ones.

"Do you know that when my friend, Clifford Odets, the playwright, went for a walk here he actually was arrested! It was late at night. A policeman asked him what he was doing and when he said walking, the policeman said, 'But where is your car?' And when Odets said he had no car, he was arrested! That's Hollywood! In no other place in the world could such a thing happen, of this I am sure!"

She sighed. And she sat down on the edge of the wide yellow sofa. Her tailored white linen sportscoat was open at the neck, her plaid skirt girlishly short, her uneven black hair awry, with none of that artificial, plastered-down, wave-in-place, polished-ballroom-floor effect.

Her vibrant tones filled the room.

"Rented emptiness," she said. "Hollywood is like a hotel—houses, apartments, furnished, ready to walk into or walk out of . . . impersonal, too."

THE VOICE shook a little. It is a fiery voice, a fitting mouthpiece to her personality, for it takes complete possession of the listener. It absorbs, leaving you breathless, and for a long while afterwards it re-echoes in your ears, making you wonder why it is impossible to pin down the accent, doing it justice on paper. It is an hysterical voice, sometimes reaching a squeal. It is the voice of a temperamental girl, all nerves and warmth and energy and impulse and honest earnestness, a girl whose entire body emphasizes her speech; the black eyes constantly roving, observing everything; the shoulders swaying or being shrugged according to her moods; the hands alive, a rhythmic, dramatic accompaniment.

Like most women who are in love, the object of Luise Rainer's affections appears obvious because his name is never far from her lips.

Now, her body tense, she clenched the fingers of one small hand.

"I could tell you so much," she said, and this time it seemed as if she were squeezing the words from her throat. "I have many regrets . . . like everyone, so many.

"I regret I have to stand for people asking me questions about what is none of their business! There are a lot of subjects I could discuss, subjects that are worth while; instead, they come and they ask (Continued on page106)

WHEN HE'S Wrong HE'S Right!

IN REVIEWING the motion picture career of Melvyn Douglas, it might occur to you that you were looking at it in one of those mirrors that makes things look like what they aren't, for he seems to be forever doing the wrong thing.

However, that isn't the case. In fact, it wasn't done with mirrors at all. It just happens that when Melvyn Douglas does what is obviously the wrong thing, it invariably turns out to be just what he should have done.

"I believe that making a mistake is often purely mental," he said thoughtfully, when I asked him about it. "It has been my experience that when I did something that, to all appearances, was a most frightful mistake, it didn't turn out to be because I didn't allow my consciousness to be hampered by a feeling that what I had done was wrong. Success is ninety per cent. luck, too, you know," he added.

But luck can't be ninety per cent. of his success. And his motion picture career, alternating as it does with his stage work, presents an enigma to the casual observer, for it is in direct contrast to almost any other successful career in Hollywood.

Ordinarily when an actor makes a favorable impression in a picture, he follows it up with other good roles. He is in demand and usually makes the most of it. Douglas, on the contrary, makes a habit of disappearing after he makes a hit picture. Sometimes he has gone to Europe for a long vacation. Other times he has disappeared in the canyons of New York, his disappearance inevitably followed by reports of his successful appearance in a Broadway show.

Success in Hollywood doesn't usually follow the actor who plays hide and seek with producers, and it is almost axiomatic that no actor or actress dares to remain off the screen for as long as a year. Heretofore, it has been only a Leslie Howard or a Helen Hayes who could make a picture and then rush off to the stage or to follow his own pursuits and, when the spirit moved him, return to Hollywood to be welcomed with open arms.

But this Douglas person, who certainly is no Clark Gable, seems to be just as effective in his quiet way. Following his frequent disappearances, he returns to Hollywood, helps himself to the very best roles available at the moment, in which he never fails to give a creditable performance, and before you know it, he's gone again.

It must be believed then that the lad has something, maybe that something that Samuel Goldwyn describes as "a habit-forming personality," meaning that audiences like him so much they form a habit of seeing him in all his pictures. Elinor Glyn described it more tersely as "it."

Whatever this elusive quality is, it is something so unusual that producers are willing to take him, when and as often as they can get him, because in addition to this especial something, he is a competent actor and generously endowed with looks.

To go back to his youth, when he began making mistakes, his mother had made up her mind that he should become a lawyer. With that in mind, she took him to court to watch the procedure as often as possible to build up his appreciation of the rewards of defending the innocent.

His father, the late Edouard Hesselberg, Russian born, internationally known concert pianist and composer, took him to musical events to build up his musical appreciation.

Melvyn himself desired more than anything to be a poet!

His mother considered it a serious mistake for him to consider any vocation other than practicing law, and to his father's mind, it was equally a serious error for him to fail to make music his life work. Both parents considered he made the mistake of his life in not remaining in college until he graduated, regardless of what he chose to do.

Subsequent results proved just how productive these mistakes turned out to be.

Melvyn was still in high school in Toronto, Canada, where the family was living at the outbreak of the World War, but he was large for his age and looked every inch a man. As he walked along the streets on his way to school, he was often jeered at by overzealous patriots because he was not in uniform.

"Are you a cripple or just a slacker?" the rowdies would yell at him.

At fourteen, a boy's sensibilities are apt to be a bit raw and even though he was an American and the United States had not yet entered the fight, he still felt that the Allies were badly crippled without his aid. He visualized himself as a Scottish Highlander, "because I particularly fancied their uniforms," he laughs now. With no chance of obtaining permission of his parents to join the Canadian forces, he took matters into his own hands, ran away and "signed up." His parents had no trouble in getting him back to the hearthside when his age was proven, but later, after he had entered college and the United States had joined forces with the Allies, he ran away again and this time he made it stick by a clever ruse.

"I had lied about my age to get in without the consent of my parents," he explained, "and I was able to convince my father that if he got me out by telling my right age, I would be liable to prison sentence for lying. So I was allowed to remain until the end of the War. I wasn't killed or even wounded. In fact, I never even got across to see actual warfare, but I wouldn't have missed the experience for anything. It was a liberal education and, in my opinion, no mistake.

"After the War, my parents wanted me to return to college. Inasmuch as I had returned safely they could forgive my running away to war, but not completing my education was, in their eyes, a serious mistake. But my father had suffered financial losses and I thought it was time for me to go to work and at least support myself.

"I had always lived close to home and had had no contact at all with the world. Working and feeling that I was independent forced a certain resiliency out of me that might have taken years to develop. I had to shift for myself and it made a man out of me." (Cont'd on page 108)

TAKING

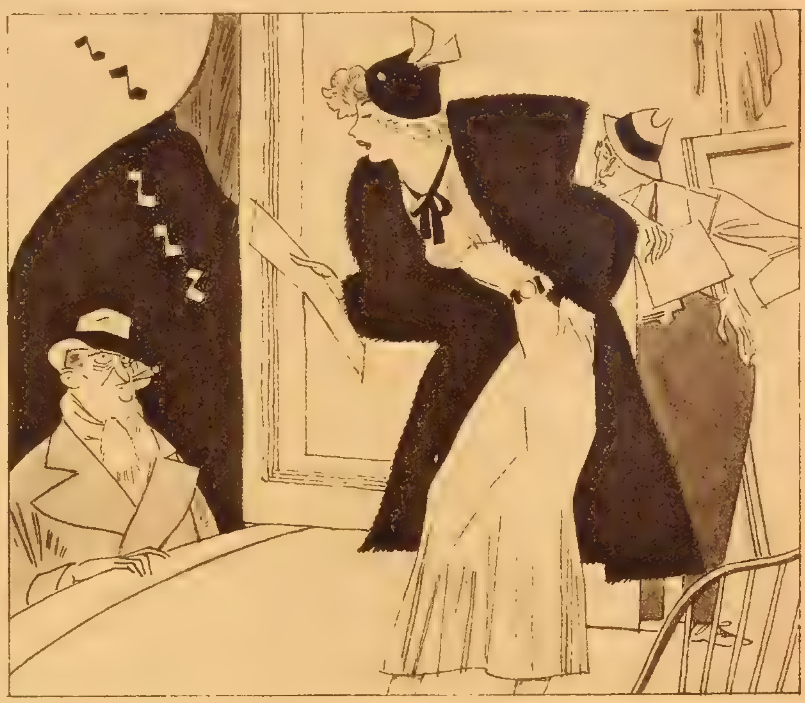
By Muriel Babcock

BRR! THERE'S nothing like a good, chilling ride in a New York taxicab on a cold, blustery day—particularly when your passenger is Irene Dunne. And no better way to learn about life.

Irene Dunne and I were having tea at the Pierre, when I asked her where she first lived in New York, where she lost her first job, whether she cried or not, what she said, and what were the tribulations she suffered in cold, granite-like Manhattan before she found fame and was paged by Hollywood.

I started asking about those early days in New York when Irene was a gangling Kentucky prima donna, determined that the world was her oyster and the Metropolitan stood with waiting arms to star her in "La Boheme," "Madame Butterfly," et al. I wanted to know what were

How would you feel if you were a stranger in a large city and you're best dress blew out of the hotel window? It actually happened to Irene.



When Dr. Griffin met Irene for the first time, he asked for her telephone number—but he didn't use it for months! Now they're a very happily married couple.

her dreams and her plans in those days and has she found fulfillment?

I also wanted to know how she spends those long vacations in New York now. Everybody knows, of course, that she doesn't spend 'em like the typical Hollywood belle—in and out of the Stork Club, El Morocco, 21 and Tony's—flashing ermines and jewels at poor benighted New Yorkers. No, that isn't Irene Dunne. We all know she goes quietly about her own business, but what is it and where is it?

I was extremely curious about Irene Dunne because she never seems to be secretive about what she does, yet nobody seems to know much about her except that she's a pretty nice girl, a good actress, a beautiful woman, a good singer and a fine comedienne. (If you don't believe the last, see "Theodora Goes Wild." It's a honey.)

And so she said, "Shall we go way back to the beginning? Yes? Well, my first memory of New York is tied up with the Pennsylvania Hotel. You know it? You don't? Well, you know where it is?"

"No," I replied weakly.

"That's right. You're a stranger in New York, aren't you? Well, I don't suppose I'll ever forget either the Pennsylvania Hotel or the Metropolitan Opera House—they are tied up with my most dramatic first memories of New York. You know where the Met is, don't you?"

"No," I replied. "But once in New York I suggested to Norma Shearer that we take a bus ride and look the town over from the upper deck. Could we take a bus ride? And would you point out some of the places associated with your early memories and tell what they meant to you?"

We took a taxi because we decided that no single bus could follow the route Irene (Continued on page 98)

I LIKE to write about hair. Because almost no head of hair is so hopeless but what something can be done about it. A girl's figure may rate only a passing grade and she may get only A for effort as far as her face is concerned, but durn near every head of hair in the world can be attractive, glossy and chic—and most heads can be more than that.

You certainly must know by this time the rudimentary rules for the care of the locks: plenty of warm oil before your shampoo. Olive oil, castor oil, or prepared, store-bought oil. Always a liquid, never a cake soap. Scads of rinsing. Daily massage, if only a minute's worth, for the dear old scalp's sake. Vigorous brushing with a stiff brush for coarse and medium hair. Gentle brushing with a gentle brush for fine hair. And don't tell me brushing ruins your wave. Better a shining, sleek noodle with a slight wave than a dull, dopey looking head of hair with a fixed, set wave any day in the year. Use your judgment and go easy on the brushing before that date, when you want your hair-do to look particularly snappy, but do see to it that your hair gets a decent amount of brushing during the course of the week. Brushing strengthens, cleanses and polishes.

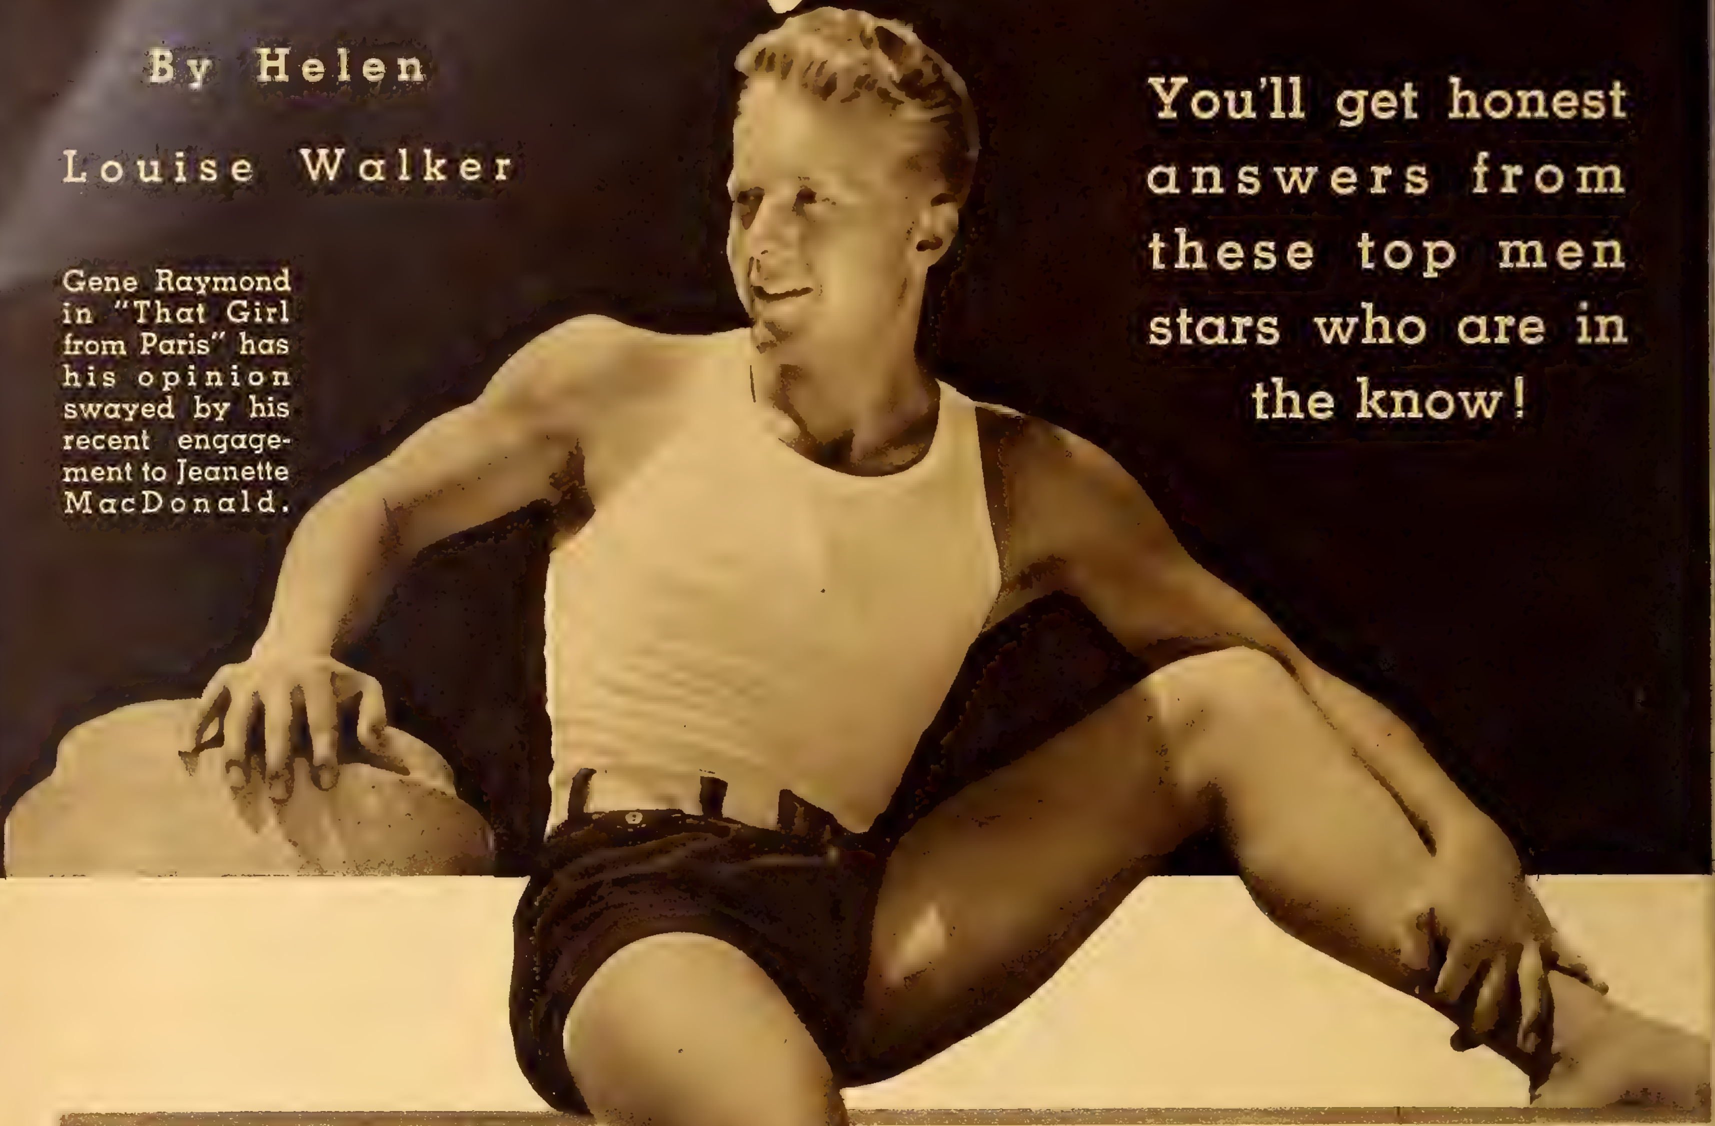
Oily and dry conditions of the hair aren't as tough problems as they seem, if you'll really get out and work on them. An oily condition comes from wide-open oil glands which pour too much oil out onto your hair; your scalp is sluggish—lazy. Stimulate it and make it work. You might think you should give up the warm oil before the shampoo. Not so, not so. You need it all the more. In the first place, the warm oil will help remove any caked oil from your scalp—also any dandruff, which usually follows in the wake of an oily condition. And as your fingers massage the warm oil into your scalp, they also stimulate the scalp—make it work for itself. Yes, keep up the oil business, but even (Continued on page 92)

Is Hollywood a

By Helen Louise Walker

You'll get honest answers from these top men stars who are in the know!



Gene Raymond in "That Girl from Paris" has his opinion swayed by his recent engagement to Jeanette MacDonald.

Clark Gable, who likes to "get away from it all," has a rather prejudiced outlook on the town.

A VISITING celebrity in the world of sport, returning to Hollywood after an absence of several years, remarked to me, "I miss the cronies whom I enjoyed so much when I was here last time. When they are working they are, as they should be, filled with that early-to-bed-early-to-rise spirit. When they are between pictures, they aren't in Hollywood at all. They are hiding somewhere. Not that I blame them! Hollywood has gone chi-chi. It's just a woman's town now."

A bit startled at his apparent bitterness, I took a hasty mental census of the whereabouts of our current he-man stars. As this was written, Clark Gable was departing for northern parts unknown on a hunting and fishing trip, accompanied by one or two of his rancher cronies who have nothing to do with the picture industry. Warner Baxter was returning from a six-weeks' camping trip in the high Sierras—his companions were all males. Ronald Colman and Bill Powell had spent the last week-end aboard a small, rented, gasolene-motored boat—fishing and bemoaning the absence of Dick Barthelmess. Ronnie was then tucked away on his miniature ranch which is as thickly walled and hedged as was ever a Greta Garbo establishment. Lee Tracy and Buck Jones were bounding over the Woman's Town?

Ronald Colman boasts the title of Hollywood's most eligible bachelor. Perhaps his reasons for being so are revealed here. He's in "Lost Horizon."

Jean Harlow, one of the town's beauteous belles, is Bill Powell's best gal, but that doesn't change his opinion a bit about this pertinent problem.

Long a happily married man, Warner Baxter knows about women. He's also very familiar with Hollywood, which makes his almost a complete education.

billows, sailing their yachts in the race from Los Angeles to Honolulu. No women are allowed aboard the boats entered in the race.

I caught up with Bill Powell, returning reluctantly to work. The effort had been strenuous and had left me slightly breathless. I panted, "Bill, exactly what is a woman's town? And is Hollywood one of them?"

IT'S GETTING to be one," he opined, looking rueful. "Paris has been called that and New York has, too, sometimes." He sat down upon an upturned flower pot which was a prop on the set and he looked reflective and introspective. "A woman's town, I take it," he brought forth at last, "is a city in which women decide how men shall spend their leisure hours—and their money. Feminine whims are laws and men must struggle for women's favors. Life is effete, elaborate, be-ruffled. People who sell orchids and emeralds enjoy it. Some wag or other put it, 'You can identify it because even the garbage smells faintly of Chanel's Number Five!' "

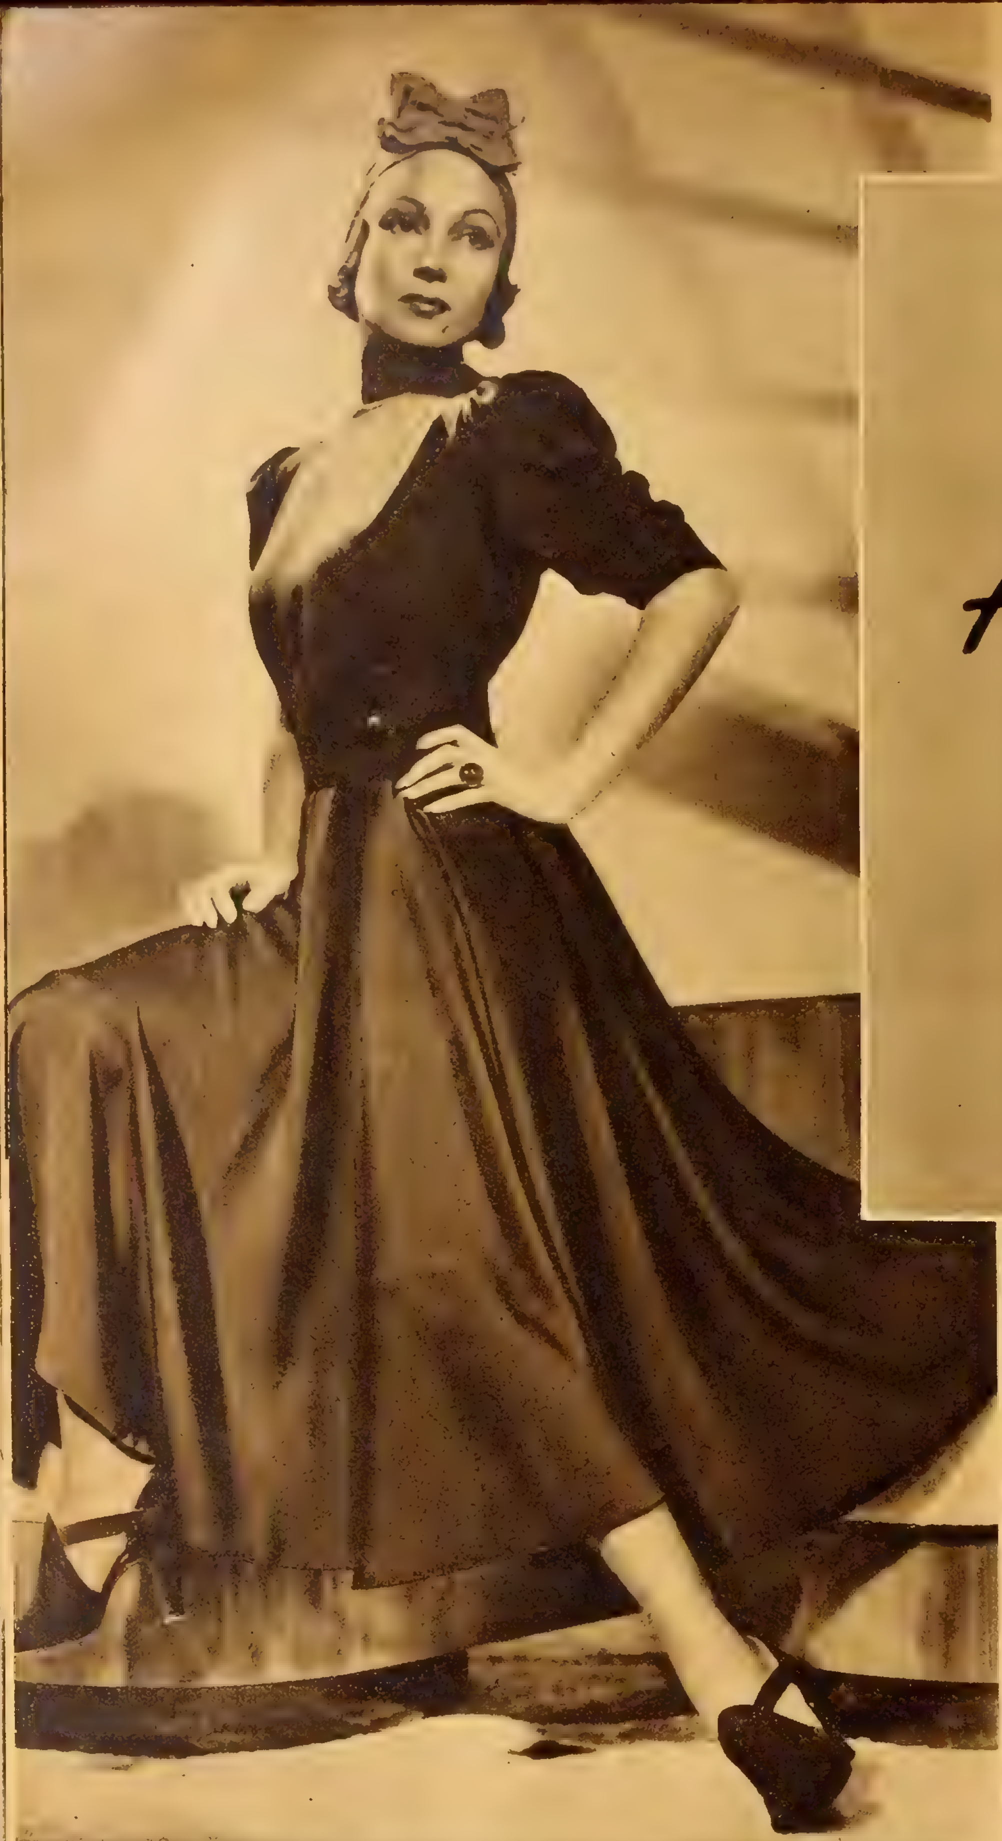
He interrupted himself hastily. "Don't think that the men don't enjoy it. The danger is that this atmosphere makes them soft. And the irony of that is that when he does become soft, even the 'woman's town' wants no more of him.

"Take, for instance, your motion picture premiere. Do you think that any mature man in his senses, would put on tails and a white tie, buy fifteen dollars' worth of orchids, face crowds and photographers and microphones just to look at a motion picture—unless he did it to please some woman? It's all right for the younger fry. They like getting into formal clothes and escorting some lush young creature through a foyer where cordons of police are fighting off throngs of admirers. But men outgrow the taste for that sort of thing—women never do. And the parties," he went on, musingly. "There is always that frantic effort to make each one different, to make it more fantastic than the last one. Don't think for a moment that men don't have fun at these elaborate frolics. Of course they do. But you never hear of a man planning one. We do pretty much as we are told in the matter of enjoying ourselves!"

It occurred to me that I hadn't heard of a real stag party in Hollywood in years. The sort of party at which men play poker and drink beer in their shirt sleeves until the dawn. Bob Montgomery told me that he gave one once—and they didn't even play poker.

"We just sat and talked!" Bob marveled, as if that were the most astonishing thing in the world. "We didn't play any games (Continued on page 112)

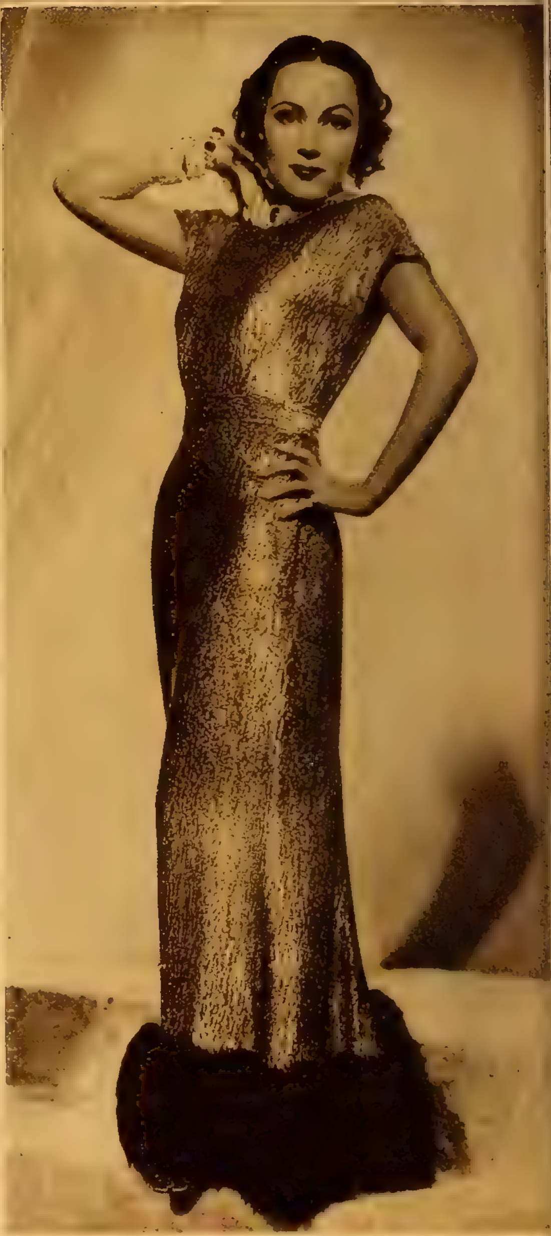
YOU Appeal in Star Fashions



The peasant trend in fashions dramatized in a black crepe dress worn by Dolores Del Rio—fitted bodice, wide belt and "swing" skirt.

NOW WHAT, I can hear the clamor rise, "is the meaning of 'you-appeal,' especially in relation to clothes?" Well, my pets, it is one of my brain waves—a two-word phrase to sum up briefly what I think is most important to you in Hollywood fashions.

A Hollywood star can be put on one of "the best-dressed women" lists (the two who look out at you from these pages have been), and she can be famous as a glamor girl, but unless she wears clothes that have a real personal interest for you and you and me, she just doesn't make the grade as a fashion guide for us. The way I look at it, the clothes, both on the screen and in the stars' personal wardrobes, that give practical ideas to you are those that have lines and details which can be adapted to your own clothes.



Dolores likes simple but dramatic evening clothes such as this gown of silver metal cloth. You could copy it effectively in blistered satin, with velvet border instead of the fur.

Constance Bennett and Dolores Del Rio give fashion pointers from their personal wardrobes that all of you can copy very economically

by Adelia Bird

This is Connie Bennett's favorite street frock for California wear. Utterly simple in cut, a wide brown sash in suede contrasts with the deep rose shade of the wool fabric.

And above, any girl could have a duplicate of this simple but lovely Iris blue taffeta evening gown. The skirt is voluminous. A corsage formed of velvet bows trims the right shoulder—a tip for you.

Fashions that have "you-appeal" have to be wearable before they are startling—and they have to be copyable before they are glamorous. In other words, a dress worn by a smart star may be dramatic and luxurious in fabric and trim yet it still can be practical as a fashion guide for you because it has copyable details and lines.

Thus we come to Constance Bennett and Dolores Del Rio, both of whom have stunning personal wardrobes which the average budget couldn't be stretched to cover but who still stay in the list of excellent screen fashion guides for you.

CONNIE AND Dolores, exact opposites in coloring, share a mutual flair for sophisticated dress. Both of them patronize the best costume designers and dress shops in Hollywood, New York and Paris. Both make a careful study of themselves in relation to everything they wear and both love simple clothes set off by unusual and rich accessories.

And where then, do they come in as inspiration for the limited budgeteers? Right here on these pages this month! For each of them, interviewed right in the midst of their new wardrobes, gave me a wealth of fashion wisdom to pass on to you. We'll start with Connie because I happen to have rung her doorbell first.

Sleek, perfectly groomed Connie with her blonde hair worn in a long bob, curled only at the ends, has one of those slender figures that is the delight of every dressmaker. Her house is sleek, too, with everything chosen to act as the perfect setting for the Bennett personality. Connie's bedroom, boudoir and closets are the sort that make you ashamed that your own belongings get into such a topsy-turvy state. Her shoes, for instance, are arranged in neat rows on disappearing doors in her boudoir. Cedar-lined closets hold her bountiful wardrobe which ranges from trim tailored suits to the most feminine of evening gowns. Everything in these closets shows the fastidious care which (Continued on page 100)

And her afternoon costume accessories—black velvet cap, black suede pumps, gloves and bag.

You have to know your type to wear a daring hat like this of Dolores Del Rio's. Of black felt with peaked crown. Shops have inexpensive copies.

Right below, Connie's pet afternoon and cocktail costume is this coat-like black velvet model that "zips" from neckline to hem.

Gertrude's latest picture, before illness overtook her, was "Make Way for a Lady." She's well again now.

She Won't Play Hunches

By Dorothy Herzog

GERTRUDE MICHAEL is twenty-four. She has titian hair, a milky complexion and blue eyes. She was born in Talladega, Alabama, which you may never have heard of. As a child, Gertrude went for the piano like a kitten for a saucer of cream. She was born with what is known as a "perfect ear." She could hear someone play a piece on the piano for the first time and then sit right down herself and do a perfect job of the same selection.

"I never have known the mathematics of music," Gertrude confessed.

She isn't the sort of young woman who would ever consciously know the mathematics of anything, but she would know them intuitively. She's a girl given to "hunches," and a hunch is simply a decision which, if made and followed, leads to happy consequences.

However, it wasn't exactly a "hunch" that took Gertrude Michael to Hollywood some four years ago to make a screen test. It was partly a hunch and partly the fact that the New York theatre wasn't giving her the jobs she had to have in order to make ends meet. In fact, things had gone so poorly in the theatre that Gertrude went down the economic scale to where she had exactly two dresses and seven dollars and ten cents between her and a bleak tomorrow.

M-G-M offered her the chance of a trip West and a screen test. They had made the same offer before, but Gertrude stuck doggedly with the theatre. The theatre no longer returning the compliment, Gertrude agreed to the studio's offer.

"I was to go west in a compartment," she explained and rolled her eyes with proper impressiveness. "But it seemed to me that if the company would let me travel in a lower berth and take the ninety dollars difference in the price of a compartment and (Continued on page 115)

A TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

Margo and Burgess Meredith reënact their stage roles for the screen version of "Winterset."

★★★★ Winterset (RKO-Radio)

Last year Maxwell Anderson's play, "Winterset," was chosen by the Critics' Circle as the best play of 1935. RKO-Radio has brought it to the screen with almost its entire New York cast intact and with a slight revision of Mr. Anderson's poetic and memorable dialogue. On the screen, it emerges as one of the year's finest artistic achievements. It is definitely a candidate for the next Academy Award, a picture which will win critical acclaim and audience approval in much the same manner as did "The Informer" a couple of seasons ago. Laid in New York's east side tenement district, it is a story of an innocent man's execution for murder, and of the vengeful quest of his son for the men guilty of the crime. Mio, the son, is superbly portrayed by Burgess Meredith, whose splendid talent is a welcome addition to the screen. Second best performance is that of Eduardo Ciannelli in the role of Trock, the cold-blooded murderer whose crime sent Mio's father to the chair. Margo, playing a young girl of the district, is excellent in a sensitive, difficult role. She and Meredith create a fine and beautiful love story against a background of their sordid surroundings. Other first-rate performers are Maurice Moscovitch, Edward Ellis, John Carradine, Paul Guilfoyle and Stanley Ridges.

On the picture's completion, Burgess Meredith and his wife, Margaret Perry, had planned to fly back to New York and their upstate farm, but a puppy upset everything. The day before leaving, the Merediths took a walk up Hollywood Boulevard and, from a pet store, a cocker spaniel gave them the glad eye. The result was the cocker became the Merediths' and they all went back by train. . . . Margo's real name is Maria Marguerita Guadalupe Valedo Castilla and she was born in Mexico City in 1917. At the age of six, she made her dancing debut there, but her family shortly after moved to Spain. Margo returned to New York at the age of fourteen to try dancing in earnest, drifted to California, via Mexico City, and landed a job at the Cocoanut Grove and later one at Agua Caliente, famed Mexican resort just across the California border. Movie folks swarm to both these spots, but no one thought Margo movie material. An eight-week contract at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel which was offered to her turned into a two-year stay there. She was persuaded by Hecht and MacArthur to appear in a role in "Crime Without Passion," which led to movie contracts in Hollywood. But Margo turned up her small nose at the movie moguls and took the "Winterset" role on the stage.

★★★ Born to Dance (M-G-M)

If you like your musicals big, lavish and loud, here's your dish. It is probably barking at the moon to register a slight complaint against "Born to Dance," what with its terrific cast and its terrific cost, but it is our suspicion that much of its noise and shouting is employed to cover up a lot of dull moments. When you have people like Eleanor Powell, Jimmy Stewart, Virginia Bruce, Una Merkel, Frances Langford, Buddy Ebsen and Sid Silvers in a picture, you're bound to have above-the-average entertainment, and you're even entitled to hope for something a little better than that. All of this is to say that the picture is a good—but quite routine—musical with enough high spots to make it worth your while. Good moments are: all of Eleanor Powell's dances, a burlesque of a symphony conductor by Reginald Gardiner, a floorwalker bit by Barnett Parker, and Raymond Walburn's comedy. Cole Porter's score is not his best. Outstanding song numbers are "Hey, Babe," sung by all the principals, and "Miss Lucy James," done somewhat in the Gilbert and Sullivan manner by Raymond Walburn, Virginia Bruce and a male chorus. Warning: the finale, said to have cost $300,000, will blast you out of your seat.

Irene Dunne and Melvyn Douglas in "Theodora Goes Wild," and the Quins in "Reunion."

There's no doubt that Eleanor Powell was "Born to Dance" and can't stop. Besides the regular eight hours on the set while making this picture, she spent an hour or two in rehearsal in the morning and at lunchtime. And had a date with Jimmy Stewart practically every night—to dance. Then between "takes" on the set, Eleanor spent every spare moment teaching her intricate steps to co-actors, prop boys, cameramen and anyone who was interested and could walk. Una Merkel was the prize Powell pupil. This was Una's first dancing role and she put her soul into it, if ever an artist did. Husband Ronald Burla had to take tap lessons in self-defense and can now out-tap Mrs. B. . . . Jimmy Stewart moved out when Henry Fonda came home with his new bride recently. Leaving the honeymooners didn't bother him so much, though, as parting with his next-door neighbor, Miss G. Garbo. He doesn't profess any real intimacy with her, but could always point with pride to the ten-foot metal fence which she had built just on his account. . . . Every cloud has a silver lining, even the Stewart clouds, and so he found that Eleanor Powell lives in Santa Monica, where he moved. The two held hands between "shots" on the set and devoted considerable time to perfecting their love scenes so they wouldn't waste any of the director's time or M-G-M's money when staging them for the camera. . . . Dave Gould is responsible for the dance staged by all the gals and also for their perfectly matched sun-tans. He gave each chorus cutie daily instructions on how long to remain in the sun in order to get his dancers all darkened to the same degree. . . . Biggest cut-ups on the picture were Sid Silvers and Buddy Ebsen and biggest expense were the Powell chiffon stockings.

★★★ Reunion (20th Century-Fox)

You will want to see this, of course, just to find out how the five gals from Callander are getting along. And we might add right here that they're developing along Ziegfeldian lines. But the picture is worth your while quite aside from the Quints' attractions. It is a simple, heart-warming story of a country doctor and the problems which confront him when he tries to untangle the lives of some of the babies he has brought into the world in the past forty years. Some three thousand of them come to a "reunion" party at his home in Mooseville, among them Esther Ralston, in the role of a movie star; Alan Dinehart, governor of a state, and his wife, Katherine Alexander; Tom Moore, a famous surgeon, and his wife; Helen Vinson, who is in love with Robert Kent, who happens to be in love with Rochelle Hudson. Many others are there, too, many of them with problems which the good doctor tries to work out to the satisfaction of all. The very real problems of these people are woven into a believable and engrossing story which will keep your interest to the final reel. Outstandingly sincere are the portrayals of the entire cast, with Jean Hersholt turning in his best role for a long time as Dr. Luke. Dorothy Peterson again plays a nurse, as does Rochelle Hudson. Robert Kent is the young doctor, John Qualen scores again as the famous father of the five and Slim Summerville is responsible for several mirthquakes. Some might object to so many details being irrelevant to a main plot, but we found that every episode contributed to making this picture an evening of good, solid entertainment.

The Errol Flynn-Lili Damita parting of the ways wasn't too much of a surprise to those who know them, but the subsequent patching-up-of-it-all was. It probably will be an on-again, off-again story. Most concrete evidence that Katie Hepburn and Leland Hayward aren't secretly married is the fact that Margaret Sullavan is now Mrs. H. Come to think of it, the marital career of the little Sullavan has been a bit on the fantastic side. When ex-husband Henry Fonda first arrived in Hollywood, Margaret, married to William Wyler, soon started going out with Henry. Following a speedy divorce from William, she stopped going with Henry and spent her evenings with Wyler. Note to Leland Hayward: if you want to be really clubby with your wife, divorce her.

Arline Judge and her motor glider have parted company. Arline bought the thing to scoot her way from dressing-room to set out at 20th Century-Fox, but she was stopped by a studio cop who asked her for her license. The Bureau of Motor Vehicles said they'd never heard of motor gliders, and the motorcycle boys refused to admit it was any of their business. So now the studio cop has a brand-new motor glider on his hands, and Arline is back on her feet again.

Arline, incidentally, spends most of her evenings dancing about with Pat De Cicco, who was Thelma Todd's former husband. First day on the "Last of Mrs. Cheyney's" set, before she switched her make-up box to "Parnell," Myrna Loy began industriously knitting between every scene. After ten days of this, with the entire company getting curious, Myrna calmly crocheted the squares together into an afghan. More fun on the "Maytime" set: The day Gene Raymond visited Metro he found Jeanette MacDonald all done up in wrinkles and gray hair. Just in case he should blanch at the sight, the future Mrs. Raymond whipped out a photo of Gene which had been retouched to give him all the earmarks of a gent who had spent the last forty years in a barroom. So they've decided to go through with the ceremony in spite of everything.

Simone Simon doesn't get around so much in Hollywood. Perhaps it's due to her statement that "leading men are the easiest to catch of all males. All you need is a pretty face, the ability to flatter and the patience to keep still while he's talking." Them are fighting words, mademoiselle.

The lady who gets around and has more boy friends than you can shake a finger at is none other than May Robson. Almost every night she dashes out to a party or to a preview and there's not a male under twelve in her neighborhood who hasn't dug down into the old allowance to shower her with flowers and peanuts. "You don't need a pretty face, affirms this vixen. "In fact, you can even have a soft spot in your head—provided there's one in your heart."

Now that Mary Pickford and Buddy Rogers have finally declared their intentions, the big question is not "will they be happy?"—it's "what are they going to call Pickfair?" After all, the mansion in Beverly Hills was named for Mary and Doug Fairbanks, and now that there will be a new lord and master there must also be a new name. Pickrog is definitely not good, but how about Buddyfair? Any suggestions?

Wandering around the Metro lot, we walked onto the "Maytime" set to watch Jeanette MacDonald emote. It was a boudoir scene, and Jeanette was to walk out on the balcony and scan the horizon—looking, perhaps, for Nelson Eddy. Director Bob Leonard called for action, and the lovely MacDonald, in silk negligee, swished out to the balcony. But before she did any emoting she suddenly turned around, faced the camera and exclaimed: "Hey! There are a couple of men on my balcony!" Two carpenters, who hadn't heard the director's call, ambled in. "Pardon us," said one of them. "Certainly," said Jeanette. "Drop in any time."

Looking over the fancy "Maytime" boudoir, we couldn't remember ever having seen Jeanette MacDonald in a picture that didn't have at least one elaborate bedroom set. So we asked Jeanette if she'd ever done a picture without one. "I made one picture without a bedroom in sight," she said. "And it flopped."

Dolores Del Rio is a sentimental gal. Just to prove it, she has pressed a flower from every bouquet her husband, Cedric Gibbons, has given her. "To always keep some part of the things that bring happiness," she says, "is to always have good luck." Better a split infinitive than a split household, is her motto.

Here's a little quotation from a hard-working Universal studio press agent: "Some actresses knit between scenes during the filming of a motion picture. Others read, study their lines, write letters or sew. But Doris Nolan is different. She whittles! She studied wood carving in school, so she often carves small boats on the set.

CHARLES BOYER'S TRUE LIFE STORY

BY GLADYS HALL

A great screen lover reveals intimate facts about his childhood and later rise to stardom

This picture of Charles, taken while he was at the Conservatoire de Drame in Paris, shows the power of the face that was to captivate the audiences of Paris.

"La Bataille" was one of the great Boyer hits on the French stage. He made it as a picture fifteen years later, which was released here as "Thunder in the East."

IN THE small French village of Figeac, in the year 1899, a woman with dark eyes and dark hair sat in her little parlor sewing. She was taking fine economical stitches in tiny garments—fine stitches as only a Frenchwoman can take.

And, as she stitched the diminutive garments, her face was composed, her body quiet—but her spirit was empire-building. For into the sheer batiste she was stitching an "unalterable conviction." A conviction that her son, when he should be born, would be set apart from other men, remote from the ways of his fathers.

As the months drew on her dreams soared and took substance. She saw him, her only son, as a doctor of the Sorbonne. She saw him frock-coated, reading philosophy to pupils. She saw him expounding law to the less enlightened. And always she saw him as far away from the little town of Figeac, as someone honored and set apart.

That he would be exceptional, she knew. This was her unalterable conviction.

Of the way in which he would be exceptional she never dreamed.

And so on the 8th of August, 1899, to Louise Boyer, née Durand, and to Maurice Boyer, a son was born. He was christened Charles.

His mother's first words when she gazed on him were, "His eyes are like his father's—and yet they are not like his father's—not like anyone's, pas du tout!"

Small wonder that the young mother of the infant Charles did not suspect the path her son's feet would travel. For there is not one drop of theatrical blood in the Boyer ancestry. He is, emphatically, what biologists call a "sport."

The father of Charles was a respected business man in the town of Figeac, as his father and his father's father had been before him. For centuries, indeed, the good bourgeois family of Boyer had plied their trade thriftily by manufacturing harvesting machines, threshing machines, silos and other farm equipment. The Boyers had served their country well. They had married, raised families and grown old in the well-trod paths. Nothing exotic, no departure from sturdy tradition had ever occurred in the family—until that morning of August 8th when the little boy was born with dark eyes so compellingly "different" that even his mother cried out that they were the eyes of a "stranger."

They would have felt disgraced, those early Boyers, if a son or daughter of theirs had followed the frivolous calling of the stage. That was another world to them. One with which they had no traffic.

But the mother of Charles had dreamed, not as other women. She had been "visited" by her strange conviction. And when she looked into the even-then mysterious face of her small son she again was overcome with the certainty that this boy was not as other boys.

Certainly, the small Charles took his first steps in a world completely divorced from anything theatrical. His baby ears were attuned from birth, not to the grandiloquent words of mummers, but to the whir of machinery coming from the small industrious factory next door. For Boyer père had installed his factory in one side of a comfortable double house in Figeac, and his family in the other half of it. Small Charles grew up with the hum and throb of machinery in his ears, with the sight of men in overalls. A life and a people far removed from the exoticism of the life the boy was destined to lead.

Louise Durand, as she watched her son's first steps, marvelled at his prodigious memory. For at the age of two he knew the names of all of his father's apprentices and the names of all the farm implements manufactured. Here, indeed, was not "just another Boyer"—but one whom the whole world would know by name and fame.

BUT AS Louise Durand dreamed her brilliant dreams, Boyer père thought only, with solid satisfaction, that at last he had a son who would carry on the business when he was gone. The fair fields of France still would be reaped and sown by machinery bearing the Boyer name.

"For the first ten years of my life," Charles told me, in his quiet, unostentatious way, as we sat together in the pine-panelled library of his Hollywood home, "I was a most naughty little boy—spoiled and petted. Then I changed suddenly but most completely. Before that change came, however, the change which divided my life as a chasm divides the land, I got into every kind of mischief available. And when none was available I invented some. I was never 'like the Boyers.' I took no interest in the factory, other than to memorize the names of the employees and the machinery. I took no interest at all in thriftily depositing my francs and centimes in my small bank. I am sure that my good father must have deplored, a little uneasily, this changeling in his home. But my mother smiled her secret smile (that smile which Charles has inherited) and was convinced that a new intellectual light had been born into the world. And because she so believed, she humored me and always 'spared the rod.'

"I did all of the things naughty little boys have done and will do so long as little boys play hob with the world. I broke the neighbors' windows. I arrogantly was unmoved when my father remonstrated with me, told me that no Boyer had ever 'destroyed good property.' I pulled the black curls of all the little Toinettes in the town. Some little girl was forever running home crying that 'Charles hurt me!'

Two future American raves! Boyer and Merle Oberon in the picture, "Thunder in the East."

Bet you don't remember that Charles played the chauffeur in Jean Harlow's picture, "Red Headed Woman!" Here they are.

"I was teacher's pet and her despair at one and the same time. She couldn't, she said, 'understand me.' I was rather good at all the studies I cared about—Latin, all of the languages, in fact; history and geography. I liked anything which I could dramatize, with myself as the central figure. And I could dramatize history and geography. While studying the latter, I would imagine myself scaling the Matterhorn, exploring the mighty Amazon, riding the western prairies of America. I always saw myself as one or another of the great figures in history. I would go home one afternoon and pretend to be Attila conquering the Huns—my playmates, God help them, were the Huns! Another day I would be one of the Louis', clad in some satin breeches of a departed Boyer, my face and hair whitened with my mother's talcum powder. But about the studies which bored me I was obstinate. I said that I would not bother with things I could not use. I have not changed in this.

"And," said Charles, with that enchanting smile of his, half mockery, half earnestness, "I was always in love. From my earliest recollection I was in love with one small Mademoiselle or another. In this respect I did change later. As we shall see. In Figeac, you know, as in all small French towns, boys and girls do not go to school together. Therefore, from the beginning, girls were more of a mystery to me than they are to American schoolboys. They were forbidden fruit. We did not meet them as competitors in the classrooms. We had no rough and tumble play with them on school playgrounds. We were segregated.

"Consequently, I was greatly intrigued with these mystical creatures. They were created, I thought, solely to be fallen in love with. And I obeyed that unwritten law of life.

"I learned early to connive for rendezvous. I became very adept at passing notes to the object of my affections, when I passed her on the street. I always managed to make friends with the brother of some especially enchanting little Mam'selle and then he was pressed into service as a go-between—delivering notes for me, small sticky packages of sweets and other tokens of affection.

"I spent all of my allowances on these ruffled enchantresses," smiled Charles. "I may be said to have 'sown my wild oats' around the age of six!

"But it was a state of being in love, more than anything else. For now, today, the faces of all those little girls are blurred to me—they have become a composite, lovely but without individuality. When I now return to Figeac and meet this or that lady of my own age, I look at her and wonder, were you one of them . . . ?"

FROM THE beginning Charles was possessed of a most amazing memory. At the age of three he took to reciting, word for word, "The Passion," a difficult and complicated religious writing from the Bible. He began, very early, to shine in school theatricals. At the age of eight he was giving one-man concerts. At the age of nine he was playing such parts as "Cyrano de Bergerac" and other tremendous roles. Shakespeare ran off his tongue as fluently as nursery rhymes from the lips of other children.

He said to me, "I had no self-consciousness whatsoever. I was inclined to be shy in 'private life,' so to speak. I still am. But on the stage, facing an audience, I felt far more natural and at ease than at any other time or place. I never experienced stage fright. I think this was because I really became the character I was playing. I forgot that I was Charles Boyer, aged eight or nine, and believed, with all my heart, that I was Cyrano, Lysander, any character I was playing. I still believe sincerely that I am the character I play. From infancy the stage was my real life, the veritable substance—and all of the rest was shadow.

In 1932, Boyer made one of his biggest stage hits in "Le Bonheur" with the French star, Yvonne Printemps.

"I had other, regular-boy interests, of course. I played a game similar to your American football. We call it 'Association.' I played marbles, skated, climbed trees and went to picnics. And I read omniverously. I spent hours in the little town library poring over the books of the Comtesse de Segur—we called them 'The Pink Books'—and there were dozens of them. They were immensely popular adventure stories similar, I should think, to your Alger and Henty books for boys."

Charles' dark-eyed mother would tell you that her exceptional son was called "The Town Prodigy." She would tell you that when he was scheduled to appear in a concert or a school play the citizenry of Figeac turned out, en masse.

And strangely, to no one did it occur that a star of stage and screen was rising in their midst. The cinema, Charles told me, was a sketchy and unimportant form of entertainment when he was a boy in France. There were no such things as French "fans." He recalls now having seen Pearl White in a serial called "The Mystery of New York" or something like that. He later recalls having seen Harold Lloyd in early comedies, when Harold was known simply as "Him" or, in French, "Lui."

No, Louise Durand simply believed that her son's remarkable memory and precocious command of audiences meant that he was indeed predestined to become a doctor of the Sorbonne, an eminent philosopher, with the wisdom of the ages and the ancients rolling off his tongue. She would have laughed heartily—though perhaps with tears in her eyes—if anyone had then predicted that he would become an actor. But no one did.

"When I was nine," Charles Boyer told me, "my father died. His passing marked the change, the chasm which divided my life. For I had to become, overnight, the head of my house. I remember being stunned and spending a night crying bitterly into my pillow. Death had touched me. And one is never quite the same thereafter.

"I also remember being struck with a lightning flash of thought. Now I shall never have to enter the factory. Now I shall be—an actor!' I realized in a dim, immature way that the truth of my whole being had been revealed to me. I felt rather ashamed of the wave of pure delight that poured through my veins.

"My life did not change substantially, however, at that time. My mother always had been the dominant factor in my small world. There had been, there still is a strong and sympathetic bond between us. We have been good friends. And so, with the death of my father, we became even closer. Upon the advice of friends, my mother sold the factory, rented that half of the house and we continued to live in the other half as theretofore.

Marriage had never entered Boyer's head until the night in Hollywood when he met Pat Paterson at a party. They were engaged within two weeks, married in two months!

My mother always says that she sold the factory because she was advised to do so. But I, who know her, suspect that she would have sold it, advice or not, so that there could be no question of my ever having to take it over.

"It was from this time forth that I ceased being mischievous. I did not realize it then, but when my father died the little Boyer boy died, too. I took my studies more seriously. I had put my life ambition into definite words the night of my father's death. I knew what I must be, what I must do. I felt the clay of my life-work in my hands and I was eager to be about the business of shaping it.

"I was twelve when I first announced to my mother that I intended to become an actor.

"It was," said Charles, with a low laugh, but his eyes grave, "the most momentous moment of my life up to that time. I knew full well how portentous an occasion it was. I had the full realization of what I was about to do to my mother. I knew on what a vital spot the blow would fall. I had the feeling that I was about to take my mother's deepest and dearest dream and crash it to the floor.

"I remember so perfectly the little twilit parlor and the way my mother looked as she sat there, serene, in her high-backed chair by the window, a bit of sewing in her hands. She invariably spent the last daylight hours in this fashion, dreaming, no doubt, about my future which I was about to murder before her eyes. Her face turned toward me with that eager, expectant, proud smile it always wore when she greeted me.

BUT HER great composure never wavered, her steady hands continued their task as I said, 'Mother—when I grow up I intend to become an actor. That is my life and I must have it.'

" 'You are too young,' my mother said, apparently without agitation, though I could perceive the beating of her heart under the lace fichu she wore, 'too young to know your own life as yet, mon fils!'

" 'No!' I cried out, 'no, I am not. I have never been too young to know this, I have always known it. It came into my mind, in words, the night my father died. But even before then, I knew. You see, I have had this conviction. . . .'

"There must have been something strange to my mother in hearing me use the word 'conviction.' She understood so well what I meant, how it was with me. For she, too, had been belabored by a conviction which never had wavered since I was born.

"But she was a very firm woman. She could not relinquish so easily her heart's desire. No, not even to give me mine. And I think she must have felt, subconsciously, for she was wiser than she knew, that what I wanted I would have—if I wanted it deeply enough. She knew that, if my purpose were sincere and passionate enough, opposition would but strengthen that purpose, delay but intensify it.

"And so she commanded me to continue with my studies, as we had planned, to enter the Sorbonne and to obtain my License of Philosophy. Then she said, and only then, would I be free to answer any calling I might choose. If the theatre still seemed to me to be my 'life' she would offer no further opposition. By the slight smile playing about her mouth I gathered that she still saw me, in her mind's eye, as frock-coated and covered with scholastic dignities. She could not easily replace that image with a grease-painted actor from an alien world.

"And so we made the pact between us. I returned to school—and to romance—again.

"For at just about this time I had had my first really memorable romance. At least, memorable in so far as I remembered the face, the form, the name of the young lady who captured my heart. She was, I think, my first love worthy of the name. She was a young woman who had come from Paris to teach our class in philosophy. She was tall, blonde and very beautiful. And she was deliciously dignified. If ever she was conscious of my burning glances, of the impassioned tone of voice in which I managed to deliver the cold, abstract theses of philosophy, she gave no slightest indication.

"I became desperate. How to reach her cool heart? How to make her know?

"At last I devised the brilliant scheme of writing my love for her into the themes I had to compose and she to correct. I realized that I might be accounted a failure in my course if I did not stick to my subject matter. No matter. I felt, feverishly, that to fail for love would be a glorious defeat. And so, instead of the erudite and dispassionate analyses of the subject matter allotted me, I wrote fiery panegyrics to her eyes, her hair, her lips, her hands, even, I think, her feet—odes to love, to love tinged with fatality, to unrequited love.

"One day, as class was about to be dismissed, she called my name. She asked me to remain after the others had gone. To remain—alone with her. She wanted, she said, to talk to me. I can see her still, as I saw her then, golden and seeming to swim before my widened eyes in a radiant haze. I am afraid that I can see myself, too, casting a slightly oblique glance of triumph upon my fellow classmen, who were all, like myself, in love with her but who had not conceived my ingenious scheme of declaring their love. I assumed, I am afraid, the nonchalant swagger of conquest.

"And then I was alone with her—standing there by her desk, my hands and feet slightly chilled, my heart hammering as I considered the now somewhat terrifying prospect of clasping her to my adolescent breast. I began to feel a little sick.

"She said, in her grave sweet voice, just tinged with a gentle amusement, 'Charles, one day you will be a very charming man, possibly you even may be a very great lover. But that day has not yet come. Why don't you wait for it?'

"Somehow, with those cool, kind words, she brought me to. She made me conscious of myself as a half-grown boy, rather ridiculous, rather more funny than tragic, certainly not devastating at all. And I had the actor's quick repulsion for a role he doesn't fit, for a part in which he cannot cut an impressive figure.

"I can't quite remember how I got out of that classroom. Maybe it is just as well! I think she took my hand and pressed it, very kindly. I think I muttered something about 'understanding,' about being 'grateful'—and then I was out of the room. That was my first 'big love scene'!

"She advised me to grow up. She did not realize, I think, that in those few moments I had grown up. A man walked out of that schoolroom. The boy must still be there, somewhere about.

"I GRADUATED from school in Figeac," Charles continued, "and I entered the Sorbonne at the age of eighteen. Few words passed between my mother and myself as to my future plans. She had said what she had to say, and so had I. Neither of us is given to talking for the sake of it.

"I lived, while at the Sorbonne, in a Paris pension. I was not free in the sense of which one thinks of a young student alone in Paris being. The life the young student leads all depends upon his family. If a boy's people place him, as I was placed, in a pension, with orders that he is to behave thus and so, to go out so many evenings a week and return at stated hours, he must behave accordingly. I did. I saw very little of the gay night life of the city. I had no romantic adventures. I went every night I was free to the theatre. I made two friends in those days who still are my good friends. One is Pierre Boyer in a scene from "The Garden of Allah." The dog, Bous-Bous, and he became fast friends during the picture's shooting.

Blancher, who played in the French picturization of 'Crime and Punishment'—the other was Phillip Heriat, once an actor, now a novelist.

"All three of us were consumed with a passion for the theatre. And it was by unanimous agreement that we went, every night off, to one theatre after another. We were all disciples of Lucien Guitry, who was then and remains still, though dead, the finest actor who ever lived. I learned more from watching him than from any other one individual. He was never Lucien Guitry. And that is what I hope and pray my professional epitaph will one day be —'He was never Charles Boyer.' Guitry ran the gamut from sombre realism to light comedy. He could hold an audience spellbound for long minutes, without saying a word, just with the gestures of his hand. I saw him fifteen times in one month, I remember. We saw all of the best plays, not once but many times. We spent hours at sidewalk cafes, or wandering about the streets of Montparnasse, or in my tiny room at the pension, always criticizing and admiring the theatre.

"We were the Three Musketeers of Mummery. We frequented the Left Bank, the Rue de la Paix, the Champs Elysées, and watched people, all kinds of people. We observed their mannerisms, their gestures, their facial expressions. We tried our observations out on one another. We attended parties, clinics, funerals, the races and concerts, always watching closely the reactions of different people at these so-different times. We tried to know as many diverse types as we could. We talked to them and probed them, trying to discover how they would react to this situation or that, to this emotion or that. And just how they would manifest their reactions.

The charm of Boyer's personality is indefinable, but a clipping from the French press read thusly . . . "He carries one away like a cork on an avalanche."

He disliked his first American picture, "Caravan," above, with Jean Parker and Loretta Young.

On the other hand, "Private Worlds," with Claudette Colbert, was exactly to his liking.

"In all my later life in Paris, even today, I go about with very few actors. My friends are almost all doctors, lawyers, authors, scientists, scholars. The actor must draw his material from every walk of life. His horizon should not be limited to his fellow professionals.

"And then in the daytime, of course, I attended all of the necessary lectures at the Sorbonne, working hard for my License of Philosophy. I knew, as I had always known, that I would never become a teacher, a diplomat or any of the callings for which the License might qualify me. But I also knew that I must keep my pact with my mother. I had to have that bit of paper as a passport to the theatre."

There were not, Charles told me definitely, any romances worth mentioning in those student days. If there were any, he has forgotten them. All of his ardors, his emotions were given entirely to that one mistress, the theatre.

A criticism from a French magazine says, "Women succumb to his great charm, his powerful personality, without being able to help themselves. He leaves them stunned and astonished, yet with all that he is superbly modest. . . ."

The French critic was correct. For despite his fascination for women his life has been singularly free of romances. He is not the "professional charmer" in private life. He has no tricks. If he leaves women stunned and astonished, he also leaves them—alone! He is superbly modest. He is simple, gracious and kind. He is intelligent, even intellectual. But he does not kiss your hand or ogle.

The course at the Sorbonne was finished. The worthy doctors presented young Boyer with his License. His mother arrived in Paris. And when she had come he said, "I have fulfilled my part of our bargain. The theatre is still my life—all of it. Have I now the right to live it?"

AND MADAME BOYER, with her cherished dream receding forever, bade it farewell without a backward glance. She gave her son his "life" again as she had given it to him once before.

"My mother then returned to Figeac for a time," Charles told me. "I entered the Conservatoire de Drame in Paris. I was refused once—accepted the second time. Pierre was there with me. At the end of my first year, I won the second prize. During my second year the play, 'Les Jardins de Murci,' was revived. M. Gemier was directing. It was not according to the rules of the Conservatoire for a student to take part in a professional production. But now and again such a thing was overlooked. Here was where my inherited gift of memory served me well. For at the last moment the leading man of 'Les Jardins' fell ill. No one was available to M. Gemier to take his place. No one who could learn the script by the following night. But I could learn it, I said. And did. And that was my first appearance, professionally. I appeared, perforce, under another name. At the close of our second year at the Conservatoire, Pierre and I tendered our resignations and made our debut together in 'La Dolores.'

"From then on, luck was with me. My mother came to Paris and we took, at first, an apartment together. A short time thereafter she married again. For which I was very glad. She had been widowed at the age of twenty-seven. She had remained so for a very long time. My stepfather was an old family friend of whom I was very fond. I did all in my power to further the match. After her marriage my mother had a menage of her own and I took an apartment by myself, which I kept up to the time of my own marriage.

"I was what you may call 'on my way.' I felt that luck was mine. I felt that I belonged only to the theatre and that love was unnecessary. I was to live without luck and to find myself the victim, so willing, of love at first sight.

"Coming events had not yet cast their shadows behind. . . ."

AS THE young Charles Boyer had felt, from infancy, that he belonged to the theatre, so the theatre felt that it belonged to him. And opened wide its arms. One success led to another. The plays he did following his debut in "La Dolores" would make a laborious listing.

He never knew the experience of sitting hungry on a park bench. He never endured the hardship of wearing out shoe leather trekking from one manager's office to another. He never heard the dreary, repetitious words, so sadly familiar to so many of his brethren, "Leave your name and address and if anything comes up . . ."

Whereas "Shanghai" was not the best of story plots, Boyer gave a moving portrayal with Loretta Young.

Katharine Hepburn secured Charles for "Break of Hearts" and here they are with John Beal at the piano.

Only a fraction of the moving beauty of "The Garden of Allah" can be gathered from these production shots. Done in Technicolor, it hits a new high in pictorial and dramatic effects. Below first row left to right, you see two scenes with Boyer and Marlene Dietrich. And in the second row, the two stars on the desert. The next picture is a scene between Tilly Losch and Boyer. On the opposite page are three more scenes with Dietrich and Boyer, which show the tense and poignant love story which made the book so popular and which has made the picture unforgettable. Certainly no two people could more romantically portray Domini Enfilden and Boris Androvsky.

Play after play, success after success "came up" for Charles Boyer. And as his success pyramided, impassioned panegyrics began to inflame the French press, ordinarily so much more conservative than ours. ". . . he always has a 104° temperature" . . . "a great artist, as radiant as radium," . . . "he is like a powerful undercurrent carrying everything in its path . . ." "his eyes are deep and keen and brilliant with strange lights" . . . "he carries one away like a cork on an avalanche" . . .

These are exact quotations. And Charles Boyer laughed at them. He said, "Perhaps I missed something of value in missing early defeat and discouragement. For we are told that suffering and struggle enrich and enhance. But I think I did my suffering and struggling in other ways. I did not take success as ultimate achievement. I do not now. I suffer always for fear that I will not achieve the perfection I crave. I sacrificed everything to the theatre.

"If it be true that a man may achieve anything he desires so long as he desires it keenly enough—then I succeeded. For it was all I desired. I had no life at all apart from my life in the theatre. I had no youth of my own—but only the youths of the young characters I played.

"It was for this reason—my single-hearted love of my work—that I swore never to marry. I felt that marriage would be impossible for me and unfair to any woman. The theatre, a wife and I could not run harmoniously in triple harness.

"And I did have, unquestionably, great good luck in those years. Perhaps the greatest luck of all was in coming to know intimately Henri Bernstein, the great playwright and author. For eight years I played all of his new plays—which meant, actually, four plays in eight years, so long was the run of each.

"I played, by the way, 'La Bataille' on the stage—and fifteen years later made the same play for the screen under the title of 'Thunder in the East.' The play was the same. The parts I played were not. For on the stage the director played the part I later did in the film.

"I made, but very disinterestedly, a few silent films in Paris. 'L'homme du Large,' 'Chantelouve,' 'La Ronde Infernale' and a few others. I had no premonition whatever that I should ever become a 'movie actor.' I would have laughed the idea off as improbable and preposterous.

"I made a tour of Egypt, Turkey, Rumania and Belgium, in repertoire. No, I am sorry . . ." Mr. Boyer gave me his kindest smile, when I murmured something hopeful about possible romances under the oblique eyes of the Sphinx or along the fabulous Nile, "sorry to be such very bad copy. But, if this is to be the story of my life, let us make it the true one, without fiction. I was far too preoccupied on that tour for any dalliance. I had too many roles to learn. I lived all of the time in those roles—you see, the story of my life is actually the story of a theatre life, little else.

"I cannot recall that I fell in love, even once, in all those years. Not really, not memorably. And if a love does not leave so much as a memory behind, surely it is not worthy of the name. Such passing fancies as I may have had—passed. They were but ripples on the surface of my deep absorption in my work. I said, indeed, that I couldn't fall in love, that for me love was not possible. Because, I thought, there is no such thing as love at first sight and that is the only way it could ever happen to me. I would never have time for love to develop and grow, slowly.

Charles and his wife, Pat Paterson, are very congenial. They live six months in Hollywood and six months in their Paris apartment.

"WE WERE not without temptations on the Paris stage," Boyer admitted, in the slightly embarrassed way in which he speaks of personal matters. "I believe that a man on the stage—in Paris, at any rate—has an even more ardent following than a man on the screen in America. The fans are not so numerous, of course, but individually they are more intense. The substance is always more potent than the shadow.

"I can recall, if it will help you, one or two rather amusing incidents," and the dark brows raised amusedly. "There was a young lady who wrote to me for many months. She pleaded for a rendezvous. I did not reply. One day she wrote again, more urgently than before. She suggested that if I would agree to meet her after the matinee, I should wear a white carnation in my lapel and make a slight bow to the left as the last curtain fell. Some three or four other men were in that play with me. I admitted them to the plot. Which was that, as the curtain fell, we should all four of us be wearing a white carnation in our buttonholes and all four make a slight bow to the left. We did. I hope the young lady had a sense of humor. A sense of humor is a healthy thing.

"There was another girl who wrote me daily letters over a long period of time—years. In each envelope there would be two letters. One was from her to me. The other purported to be from me to her. She wrote, in my name, ideas, dreams, plans, thoughts. She endeavored to prove to me thus that she understood me as well if not better than I understood myself. It rather worried me, that strange dual correspondence. Because, though definitely pathological, it was also intelligent and sensitive. One day the letters ceased and never came again. Yes, I have wondered . . .

"I met one of the fans occasionally for tea or for a cocktail. The meetings never developed into anything—not even friendship. The fan interest, you see, is predicated on curiosity. It masquerades under many names—love, passion, friendship—but it is essentially curiosity, rootless and transitory.

"The actor should never become the man.

"And so I speak the simple truth when I stress the lack of any real romance in my life during those busy years.

"Well, then, to resume—I returned to Paris after the tour to find that talkies had come to motion pictures. I was asked to make a picture in Germany for Ufa. I hesitated. I felt that I photographed badly. I loved the stage too well to take the cinema seriously. I did not believe that I ever would like it. However, here was something new. I felt that with the advent of talkies something tremendously significant had occurred in the world of entertainment. Something that might well be mortally wounding to the theatre. One must grow, though the pains be severe. I made the picture for Ufa.

Any day he's not at the studio, you can find Charles in his study, where he finds great relaxation in both writing and reading.

"Shortly after the Ufa picture, M-G-M asked me to come to Hollywood to make French versions for them. There followed, then, a period in my life I would like to forget. A period given over to signing contracts and in asking to be released from them. A time when Luck seemed to have deserted one of her favorite sons. I was very unhappy and it was my first experience with unhappiness. I felt that at the fork of the road I had taken the wrong turning.

"I came to Hollywood. I did not like it. The one bright spot in my life here at that time was my friendship with Maurice Chevalier. I had met Maurice in Paris several years before, at an evening party. We had admired one another. But it was not until we were in Hollywood, two Frenchmen alone, that we really became intimate friends. We played golf together. We dined and talked and were homesick together. I miss Maurice now. I do not know whether he will ever come back to Hollywood or not. He loves the life of Paris. He loves his villa at Cannes. He is having such great success over there. Perhaps, in a year or two. He should come back, for there is no one to take his place. That cannot be said of everybody. He is unique and without a counterpart in the world of entertainers." Both of our glances wandered to the large framed photograph of Chevalier which, with a portrait of Charles' mother, one of Pat Paterson Boyer and one of Charles himself, are the only photographs in the library.

Although a native Frenchman, and his wife an Englishwoman, Charles is a great convert to California. His fine, new home overlooks Hollywood Boulevard and here he is in his pine-paneled library.

The Boyer home in Hollywood boasts a playroom, and this impressive bar!

"I made the French version of 'The Big House,'" Boyer went on, "and the French version of 'The Trial of Mary Dugan.' I had, also, made several talkies in France by that time. Of which 'Liliom' was the only one to be released in this country. Shortly, it became obvious to producers that French versions were costing too much money; that they could take care of their French market by means of sub-titles. So they decided to abandon French versions. They had me under contract. I could not speak a word of English. What to do with me? I was not used to having people wonder what to do with me. I was miserable. My friends all urged me to learn the language. Especially Ruth Chatterton, who assured me that I would succeed enormously if I could but talk. I didn't think so. But here I was. I did not know how to handle failure, what to do with the thing. I learned a little English. And I was cast in 'The Magnificent Lie,' with Ruth Chatterton, in 'The Man from Yesterday' and in 'Red-Headed Woman.' All very small parts and all *mis*cast rather than cast, so far as I was concerned. I knew that if I continued in this way I would be hurt in Paris. My reputation there would be tarnished by the poor one I was building up here. I asked for my release and got it. I flew away.

WHEN I returned to Paris I did, however, take up the study of English seriously. I did more plays. I made, soon, the film version of 'Thunder in the East.' Then Fox Films cabled for me to come back to Hollywood and make 'Caravan.' I can explain my return only by admitting that my previous failure rankled. It was an unhappy and an unlaid ghost and it haunted me. I returned and made 'Caravan.' Which was ridiculous for me. I am not the type to wear black curls and play mad music in the moonlight. I felt a fool. And again I was unhappy. Again I asked for my release and got it. That would have been the end of Hollywood for me and of me for Hollywood if I had not chanced, before I left, to meet Walter Wanger. And that meeting is why I am here on the screen today. For it was Wanger who induced me to make 'Private Worlds.' Which I always shall consider my first real motion picture. The others were all steps, or rather missteps, very faulty, very fumbling. They were errors of judgment on my part as well as on the parts of others.

"For the first time, after my meeting with Wanger, I was happy again in my work. I had met a man who understood me, who knew what I should do and could do. I would not leave him now for double what any other producer could or would offer me.

"And I met Pat. Love at first sight happened to me.

"I caught one glimpse of her face and all of my theories and prejudices were blown away, as so many dried leaves left over from a long-ago autumn.

"That love at first sight should happen to me," Charles Boyer said, with a self-mocking smile, "was Life's most delicious revenge on a self-opinionated fool. How often I had mocked and been amused by the idea! I had said that it was a charming fancy for poets and adolescents and for the emotionally unstable. I had never taken the professed 'grand passions' of my fans seriously because I had not believed that the sight of a face, the sound of a voice could awaken the profound emotion of love. I was wrong. I learned, in the tick of a clock, how wrong.

"For I saw Pat. And, instantaneously, I knew that I was in love. Not the shadow of a doubt passed over that sure knowledge. This was love. And I was a lover . . .

"I had accepted an invitation to dine at the home of Robert Kain. It was a casual invitation, casually accepted. I did not know who the other guests were to be. Even if I had known it would have made no difference to me. For I had never seen Pat on the screen and she had never seen me—not even our shadows had crossed before that night. I had not dressed and I arrived rather late. The small group of guests were gathered in the living-room finishing their cocktails when I arrived. I stood on the threshold of my Fate—and didn't know it.

"When I entered the room, I saw her. We were two strangers meeting. But with one glance we were strangers no longer. Within two weeks we were engaged, within three months we were married!

"The marriage was as sudden, as unpremeditated as the falling in love. We were going, the night of our marriage, to see 'Queen Christina' at the Chinese Theatre. When we reached the theatre, there were no seats. We stood in the lobby (on the footprints of Chevalier!) and thought what we might do as an alternative. I looked at her. I said, 'Let's be married—now!' We flew to Yuma and within the hour we were married.

"When the news broke, no one believed it. Chevalier discredited the report." (I knew how thoroughly Chevalier had discredited the report, for I had chanced to lunch with him a couple of days after that sudden marriage. And Chevalier had said to me, "I couldn't believe it of Charles. Why, he could have had any woman in France. Women were mad over him, but he was never intrigued. Anything can happen to anyone if this has happened to Charles!")

"My mother," Charles was saying, "was alarmed. She felt that I, being I, had made a mistake. She feared for both of us. But this summer when Pat and I went to France they met and now my mother loves Pat, too, understands. She understands that this, miraculously, is right for me. They found that they had much in common. They were congenial and happy together. Pat learned to speak very good French and all was very well.

PAT GAVE up her contract soon after our marriage so that she would be free to go to France with me when I must go. Recently she, too, has signed with Wanger. I am glad for that. I am in favor of her working. Idleness is bad for pretty women—they get into mischief," smiled Charles. "And so, until we have a family, I believe that some work is good for her.

"Well, after I was married, I returned to Paris and made 'Mayerling.' It was directed by Litvak, a Russian. So good and great a director is he that I have influenced Wanger to bring him over here and the American public will know more of him soon.

"I shall work here six months and six months in Paris," Charles was saying, "for the present, at least.

"And I am happy again. I have found my way once more, thanks to Wanger. I am happy in my work. I enjoyed making 'The Garden of Allah.' And I am happy in my marriage. I have learned what I should have surmised years ago—that marriage and the theatre are compatible, can be two halves of a perfect whole if the marriage and the woman are right.

"And because my marriage is right for me, because Pat fits so perfectly into my life as an actor, and enriches my life as a man, I can still say of the theatre, 'It is my life. . . .' Which is as it should be. Marriage which subtracts nothing and adds immeasurable things is what marriage was intended to be.

"We have our apartment in Paris, Pat and I. It is, for the time, our real home. We have taken this house in Hollywood, furnished, and I am hoping that my mother, widowed again, is here to stay with us.

From the time he was a small boy, Charles Boyer knew that he wanted to act. His mother, however, had other plans for him. She wanted him to graduate from the Sorbonne in Paris and become a great professor. Torn between his loyalty to his mother and his own great ambition, he spent the required number of years at the Sorbonne, received a degree in Philosophy and then told his mother he wished to become an actor. It took only a brief year in a dramatic school to put him on the stage. His great screen and stage success has proved he was right. "The Garden of Allah" is his current picture and he will next make "History Is Made at Night" with Jean Arthur as lead.

Coarse pores and ugly, deepening lines do more to add years to your face than any other skin faults. What causes them? How can you ward them off?

A Faulty Underskin—

Both come from a faulty underskin.

Pores grow larger when tiny oil glands underneath get clogged . . . Lines form when fibres underneath sag, lose their tone.

To keep these little glands and fibres functioning properly, you must invigorate that underskin. You can—with regular Pond's deep-skin treatments.

Pond's Cold Cream contains specially processed oils. It goes deep into the pores, clears them of make-up, dirt, clogging oils. Then you pat more cold cream in briskly. You feel the circulation waken. Your skin tingles with new vigor.

As Jean Harlow Sees Herself

"When I say that my professional personality is a role I have assumed, I mean just that. I am not a 'born' actress. I am not a 'born' public character. I know that only too well. I know it because all of the demands made upon a public charactor are agonies for me to bear. All of the graces expected of a public character are mine, if at all, only by virtue of gritted teeth and clenched fists and stern self-discipline. When I have to make personal appearances, speeches, sign autographs in a crowd I am, mentally, using a whip on myself. I am saying to myself, 'Go on—go on—do it—you've got to do it—!'

"I am sure that I was not intended by Nature to be in the limelight. I don't quite know what I was intended to be but the chances are that a little house-wife role somewhere in Kansas, a member of the Saturday Current Events Class, a member of the Country Club, with luck, would have been a more fitting millieu for me than the arena.

"I am not good at all in public. I am not even a good hostess. I have no social graces. I am uneasy when I am entertaining more than two or three persons and I am even uneasy with two or three persons unless I know them well. I have no natural facility for 'mixing.' I have very little casual small talk.

"I can sit in front of the fire at home and talk half the night through with one or two intimate friends. I love to talk. I love to know what people are thinking and feeling and doing. But add one stranger to that circle and I am afflicted with acute tongue-tieditis.

"No, when I look at myself in the mirror I certainly do not see a 'movie actress.' I do not see Jean Harlow, screen star. I've said before what I say again—that while I know Claudette Colbert and Norma Shearer and Carole Lombard and the other girls are glamorous stars I never feel like a movie star to myself.

"I never get over being surprised, a little shocked, with the kind of a shock you get when someone dashes cold water in your face, when I go out in public and people recognize me, point me out, ask for my autograph.

"I am so afraid," Jean wailed, "of sounding falsely modest. There is nothing quite so sickening. It wouldn't be honest, for instance, for me to say that I am a homely, even a plain girl. I know I'm not. I know that I am, at times, quite effective-looking. But I also know that those effects are achieved at the cost of thought and effort.

"To counterbalance this self-depreciation further I will now hand myself a little bouquet. I have a very nice disposition. Sunny and even. Children like me. Dogs like me. Cats like me. Servants like me. I never sulk or have tantrums. I don't bear grudges. I may not have much chin to speak of but I can 'take it' on what chin I have.

"I can read words of more than one syllable. And so I am, as a matter of fact, fairly well read. I am not entirely non compos menti when politics, science, art, music, etc., are being discussed.

BUT to go back to the disposition of which I speak so highly. I must also add that it comes, in part, from a certain form of mental laziness. I am the laziest female in the world when it comes to avoiding unpleasant issues. I put up with people who take too much and give too little rather than become ruffled, rather than 'make a scene' about it. I can't stand unpleasantness. I'd run a mile to avoid a harsh word, a black look. If I know that I have any kind of a battle on my hands, my instinct is to run to cover. The softest, darkest, most concealing cover I can find. My 'cover' used to be my mother. But, wisely, she refuses to act as a hide-out for me any longer. She knows, she says, that she cannot always be with me. She says that the time comes for all of us when we must face the world without a refuge to run to. The time has come for me, she says, to face my own music.

"I'm improving, too," Jean said. "I am beginning to be able to fight with the best of them.

"When I first began in pictures, I took it all as a lark. I was slack about things. I didn't want to take it too seriously because if I did, I knew I would be called upon to Do Something About It, to fight battles, to have Causes.

"I'd be a sissy," laughed Jean, "if I'd let myself be. It's a natural tendency. When I was a small child I'd take the blame for things I didn't do rather than rise up and take my own part. I'd let other youngsters tell tales on me and get away with it rather than speak up and save my own skin. 'Passive resistance,' I am afraid, was my motto as well as Mr. Gandhi's. I'm afraid it doesn't do in a highly competitive world.

"I am too emotional. I let my emotions run away with my better judgments. If I like a person or a thing I have no scales on which to weigh those persons or those things, to find out whether or not they are 'wanting.'

"I'm naturally impractical. Too impractical. I have to fight this in myself all the time.

"I wasn't born with any sense of the value of money. I had an infantile reaction to it. I almost thought that it was pretty gold and silver stuff to let drop through my outstretched fingers. Or pretty pieces of paper to cut up for paper dolls. Figures of speech, of course, but it really was almost as bad as that.

"But I am learning. I think that I am honest with myself. I realize that I am as good and no better than my last story and director. I know how perfectly horrible I was at first. No one," said Jean grimly, "knows it any better than I. If I had any latent talent, I have had to work hard, listen carefully, do things over and over and then over again in order to bring it out. I know how much I have had to learn and also I know how much I have yet to learn. I was not a 'born' actress. I can only hope that I may deserve to be called one when I die.

"I do not 'see myself' as a glamorous figure of luxury," the luxurious looking, honest-eyed girl said, "because luxuries, per se, really mean so very little to me. Oh, I don't mean that I don't enjoy them when I have them. I do, of course. Every woman does if she tells the truth. I like comforts. I enjoy attractive clothes, and jewels and furs and cars and good food and pleasant service. But I don't set such store by these things that I would consider life ended if I didn't have them.

"I can live very happily without mansions and mink coats and imported models and priceless perfumes. If I cared so tremendously for these things would I go about, as I do more than half the time, in slacks and sweaters and sneakers and no make-up?"

AND right here is the time and the place to say that this evaluation of herself is a fact. I thought how, a few months ago, Jean and her mother deliberately sold, all but lock, stock and barrel, that gleaming white mansion de luxe on the hills of Belle Aire. That mansion Jean built for her mother. Sold it because they had "so little use for it." Sold it because they had dined only twice in one year in that spacious, formal dining-room. Sold it because they had, they said, "no use" for the pool, the game rooms, the white-and-crystal salon, the opulence of an estate made for spectacular entertaining and a spectacular hostess. "Mother and I weren't cosy there," Jean told me. "We didn't feel comfortable." So they sold it and rented a modest, comfortable house on a modest, tree-shaded street in Beverly Hills and feel "at home" and comfy and themselves.

"I can face myself," Jean said, "as I am and tell myself truthfully that I am not afraid of being poor, not afraid of having to use my hands if occasions or circumstances should demand. Not afraid of driving in a Ford or of using shoe leather, not afraid of going without expensive dresses, hair-dressers, servants, service. Not even afraid of losing my 'job' in pictures, if I should have to face that possibility. I could always find work of some sort to do and I wouldn't be high-hat about it either.

"I'm not afraid of anything in the world except one thing—being hurt by the people I love. In the hands of the few people I deeply love is vested the only power on this earth to frighten me, to wound me, to make me cry 'Surrender!'

"I have achieved, of late, a degree of peace. I feel, now, at peace with myself and with my world. I have attained this state of being by forcing myself to realize that all I can do is done in the best way I know—and that that is that."

Jean Harlow is the only star I know who is completely different off the screen from what she appears to be on the screen. Take any one of them . . . Clark Gable, on the screen, is a lusty, vital fellow with a sense of humor, a punch in his fist. And that is precisely what Clark is, really. Take Garbo. She is, on the screen, aloof, mysterious and remote. Ditto off the screen. Take Bill Powell. On the screen he is sophisticated, suave, witty and wise. Bill is no different off the screen than on.

But Jean Harlow is different. The on-screen glamor is transmuted, off-screen, to a gentle gravity. The hard-boiled character of "Blonde Bombshell," the knock-'em-down-and-drag-'em-out of "Libeled Lady," is the girl who is timid before people she doesn't know, afraid of the power of those she loves to wound her. The seductive, glamorous screen Harlow is the girl who isn't afraid to use her hands, drive about in a Ford or walk it, dress in tennis shoes and slacks if silks and satins are no longer hers.

No, Jean doesn't "match," not in the way she meant it, but in a much deeper way.

DON'T LET ADOLESCENT PIMPLES WRECK YOUR BIG "DATES"

PIMPLES cause countless girls and boys to miss out on good times. They are very common after the start of adolescence, from about 13 to 25.

At this time, important glands develop and final growth takes place. Disturbances occur in the body. The skin gets oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin—pimples appear.

Fleischmann's Yeast clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Pimples go! Eat 3 cakes daily, one about ½ hour before meals—plain, or in a little water—until skin is entirely clear. Start now!

What Will Happen to Them in 1937?

1937 holds the threat of the passing of one more dear one.

JEAN HARLOW and BILL POWELL: Both Jean and Bill come into a very fine year. "These two are headed for marriage," are Dareos' words. Yet he warns them that only by the most earnest, wholehearted adjustment to trying situations and inevitable problems should they undertake marriage. "Jean Harlow was never born to see happiness in marriage, neither was Bill Powell," says Dareos, "yet with their intelligence, courage and love, they can work against the destiny that faces them."

JEANETTE MACDONALD and GENE RAYMOND: "They face a disastrous future. Jeanette," says Dareos, "is a great artist, born to do great things artistically, but if I had my way I would ask her to remain single for at least two years. She would spare herself the threat of much unhappiness." Gene, too, will achieve professional heights, but there are clouds ahead—an accident looms.

GARBO: The coming year will carry threats to her health which will be more dangerous than ever before. She should retire to a secluded place. There is unrest ahead of her. The planets frown. There is death for one of her dearest friends, too.

ROBERT TAYLOR and BARBARA STANWYCK: Dareos links these two because it is predestined. "The loveliest marriage of the screen world, which should bring happiness and everlasting joy, will be that of Bob and Barbara," he says. "She will be to him a great asset and help him to the screen's greatest pinnacles; for her, he brings the rebirth of true happiness. One of her former loves will try to 'come back,' but this must not be permitted to happen. Barbara and Bob are ideally mated."

For FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW, SHIRLEY TEMPLE, JANE WITHERS, Dareos sees a year of success, marred only by minor threats of illness, and the probability of unsuccessful attempts at extortion or kidnap, none of which will materialize dangerously.

JANET GAYNOR: 1937 will be a great love year, and she should announce her engagement. Her career, despite rocky roads, will go on splendidly.

LORETTA YOUNG: Loretta was born under the sign of Capricorn. It is not a tranquil sign. If she marries Eddie Sutherland, the director who pays her ardent court now, disaster will result, warns Dareos. Moreover, he warns Loretta that her health is still in danger. For her, 1937 is not a year that carries the promise of happiness.

CONNIE BENNETT: She has a bad year to look forward to. As a love year, 1937 promises no peace for Constance. On the screen, she will do some fine work if she wants to. She must guard her health.

JOAN BENNETT: There is a threat of sickness and, though Dareos shudders to tell it, there is the shadow of death very close to Joan, either in 1937 or 1938.

CLARK GABLE: "He is not going to become free from Mrs. Gable," says Dareos, flatly. "Unless I am badly mistaken, they will remain joined. As for marrying Carole Lombard, that is impossible." Odd, but the charts of their fortunes, says Dareos, portray Clark, Mrs. Gable and Carole as a trio. Their lives are interlinked. Always, in the life of any one of them, the other two will play a part. Clark must be very careful of his health. Unless he is, there is the threat of an illness so serious that the danger of death overhangs. As for Carole's career, it will be met with continued success during 1937.

CLAUDETTE COLBERT: The threat of gossip will rage about her, but Claudette will emerge triumphant, and her year will be a happy one.

GARY COOPER: For Gary, too, scandalous tongues threaten. There will come inevitable rumors of a domestic crash, but there will not be a separation; there will certainly not be divorce, no matter what the rumors.

GEORGE BRENT: It will be a good year, professionally. 1937 will play a great part in his love life. He must beware of danger—danger of injury that might bring hospitalization at the year's end.

MERLE OBERON and DAVID NIVEN: They are ideally suited. They should marry—whether or not they will, I cannot foretell. If they do, I can tell them that the planets promise great happiness.

MARY ASTOR: "1936 has not ended her time of sorrow; 1937 will bring more! She has had hard times and smiled bravely through. But she will need more of that courage. She was never born to be happy in marriage. Yet, she will marry again! She should not rush into marriage now, only to find later, that someone else will come into her life with the promise of greater happiness, too late."

DICK POWELL and JOAN BLONDELL: "They are a marvelous couple, but I am afraid I see a cloud in their personal life. Something will happen. Joan Blondell's destiny carries the threat of severe tragedy and sorrow!" For them, in 1937, Dareos sees the probability of a baby—but whether it is their own, or adopted, the planets do not reveal.

ALICE FAYE: "Her climb has just started, and her greatest success will come two or three years from now. I see marriage ahead for her in 1937—although she should stay out of it, for it will interfere with her career."

MIRIAM HOPKINS: "If she doesn't look out, she faces the threat of a whipping worse than Mary Astor suffered; scandal threat looms," predicts Dareos. Yet, professionally, 1937 is a brilliant year. Marriage for her with an actor born in December appears to be a possibility.

GRACE MOORE: In the near future, probably in the coming year, Grace Moore will have trouble with her voice. She will have to rest, stay away from the platform and the microphone for a long time. Yet it will prove a blessing in disguise, for she will recover and return to greater success.

Other charts into which Dareos has peered for MODERN SCREEN give him less clear, less definite pictures.

For SIMONE SIMON, he foresees a great year, but her private life is veiled in mystery even for his eyes. WARNER BAXTER'S screen success is threatened by the cloud of a serious illness. For JOHN BOLES, there is the danger of an accident while riding; an accident that may cut short his career. LAWRENCE TIBBETT should shy from air travel. His greatest success will not be on the screen, but on the radio. MARLENE DIETRICH will have to beware of a great scandal.

says: "He and his wife will be very happy." Dareos has always contended, despite the evasiveness of Charlie and Paulette Goddard on the subject in the past, that they are married.

For GINGER ROGERS and FRED ASTAIRE, Dareos sees continued teamwork, despite rumors of a professional break-up. KATHARINE HEPBURN is surrounded by scandalmongers, and the year carries the threat of a sudden sorrow for her. BOB MONTGOMERY had better look out, for a designing widow is on the make for him, warns Dareos. Scandal threatens SPENCER TRACY, and air travel bears a hint of danger.

ERROL FLYNN'S career stretches successfully ahead, but whether it will be on the screen or in another field, it is hard to tell. His life bears the stamp of success, yet there are indications that travel will take him from the screen.

Dareos' predictions carry the promise of continued success and unmarred future for MICHAEL WHALEN, JUNE LANG, GLADYS SWARTHOUT, JIMMY STEWART, GLADYS GEORGE, MAE WEST, FRED MACMURRAY, BING CROSBY, and BETTE DAVIS.

For others, he sees unhappiness and sorrow that will mar a year otherwise fairly tranquil. The nature of these threats is too obscure at this time, but those over whom the menace hangs include MAUREEN O'SULLIVAN, IDA LUPINO, CARY GRANT, RANDY SCOTT (over whom an accident threat lurks), FREDRIC MARCH (scandal menaces).

OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND is on the threshold of a brilliant climb. By the end of 1937, she will be one of the very top stars of the screen. The year's other "best bets," according to the stars, are Robert Taylor, Fred MacMurray, Luise Rainer, Carole Lombard and Merle Oberon.

For the others, Dareos hates to say it, but the year will be one of the beginning of the inevitable decline, and the beginning of the rise of new stars who will replace your favorites of today.

Our Trip Abroad

House of Lords where they met Lord Lansbury, former minority leader of the House of Commons.

For Lilliane, the full day of screen tests at the Gaumont-British studio was the peak of the trip. Sonnie Hale, Jessie Matthews' husband, not only wrote the script for their tests, but actually directed them himself. Both the winners were highly complimented upon the success of these tests, for they photographed excellently.

EVERY day was full of surprises while they were in England. The English studio turned a car over to them for their exclusive use. They paid a visit to Oxford and a flying trip over the countryside and London. They met Paul Robeson, Anna Lee, Roland Young and George Arliss, together with many others of the popular English stars.

At night they saw London, went to the famous London Casino and did the successful shows of the season. In fact, they missed very little, though time was limited.

The trip back was as exciting for them as the one over. And Lilliane struck up a great acquaintance with none other than the famous novelist, Vicki Baum, who wrote "Grand Hotel," remember?

Now, Lilliane Kerekes and John Beattie are back home—Lilliane in Detroit, Michigan, and John in Deerfield, Massachusetts, wishing they had it all to live over again!

Both winners agreed that it was a memorable adventure and that they can't begin to be grateful enough to MODERN SCREEN for making the trip possible and to Gaumont-British for entertaining them so royally.

Children's Hour

SPECIAL CARE IN EVERYTHING...
FROM SPECIAL TOYS THAT TEACH...TO A SPECIAL LAXATIVE...
THAT'S WHY CHILDREN THRIVE BETTER TODAY...

SEE THAT TOY?

It's a special toy...made to teach children how to think and use their hands. Doctors tell us that practically everything children get today should be made especially for them...even their laxative.

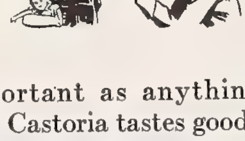
It's common sense, isn't it? For a child's system is tender...too delicate for the harsh action of an "adult" laxative.

So when mothers seek professional advice on this subject, doctors usually prescribe Fletcher's Castoria—the laxative made especially and only for children.

Fletcher's Castoria works chiefly on the lower bowel. It gently stimulates the natural muscular movement. It clears away the waste without any harsh irritation, without any violence.

Fletcher's Castoria can never upset a baby's tender stomach. It doesn't rush turbulently through his tiny system. And it won't cause diarrhoea or cramping pains. You see, it contains no harsh drugs, no narcotics. Only the purest of pure ingredients. A famous baby specialist said he couldn't write a better prescription than Fletcher's Castoria.



And important as anything else... Fletcher's Castoria tastes good. Children love it—think it's a treat. Some mothers are inclined to overlook the importance of pleasant taste in a laxative. They forget that forcing a child to take a bad-tasting medicine can completely and seriously upset his entire nervous system.

So stay on the safe side, as millions of mothers are doing, and keep a bottle of Fletcher's Castoria on hand, always. You can get it at every drug store in the country. Ask for the Family Size bottle. It lasts longer...and gives you more for your money. The signature, Chas. H. Fletcher, appears on every carton.

of the dishes I am about to describe to you. The coupon at the end of this article will bring you a copy of the leaflet containing these Flynn favorites, absolutely free, so just fill it out and mail it in. But first let's enjoy our culinary voyage with our fascinating guide, following a route he traced for us on the tablecloth and stopping off in each place just long enough to collect a recipe for one of the outstanding examples of that particular country's achievement in the line of distinctive foods.

OUR first stop will be France—justly famous for all its cooking—and from whose unlimited store of recipe material we cull two outstanding ideas for preparing vegetables in new ways. The first is French Devilled Tomatoes with a sauce such as the French excel in making and which gives distinction to what would be, ordinarily, just another platter of fried tomatoes. The recipe for this sure and easy success will be found below.

I'm also going to give you the other vegetable recipe right away. I'll bet any man who tastes asparagus fixed in this fashion will add his cheers to Errol's, whose description of this dish made me ask if I might get more specific directions from his cook. A permission cheerfully granted and soon taken advantage of with the following recipes to offer as a result.

FRENCH DEVILLED TOMATOES

Use green or slightly under-ripe tomatoes. Slice them, without peeling, into half-inch slices, crosswise. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Fry slices in butter in heavy frying pan until slightly browned on one side. Turn carefully and fry on the other side until browned and tender. Remove slices carefully, without breaking, and arrange on hot platter. Serve with the following Mustard Sauce.

If preferred, tomato slices may be dipped in flour after seasoning and before frying. Or they may be dipped in crumbs or cornmeal, then in slightly beaten egg diluted with a little water, then in crumbs again.

MUSTARD SAUCE

yolk of 1 hard-cooked egg
4 tablespoons butter
2 teaspoons sugar
1 teaspoon dry mustard
a pinch of salt
a dash of pepper
2 tablespoons vinegar
1 egg, beaten

While yolk of hard-cooked egg is still hot, rub it to a paste with the butter. Add remaining ingredients in order given. Cook mixture over boiling water until it thickens to a soft custard consistency, stirring constantly. Pour mixture over cooked tomato slices and serve immediately, garnished with sprigs of parsley or watercress.

FRENCH FRIED ASPARAGUS

cooked asparagus tips, fresh or canned salt, pepper
fine bread crumbs
1 egg, slightly beaten
2 tablespoons milk
deep pan of fat for frying

Drain asparagus thoroughly. (I used canned "mammoth" tips when testing the recipe.) Sprinkle asparagus with salt and pepper. Roll, one stalk at a time, in fine bread crumbs. Dip each in slightly beaten egg mixed with milk, then roll in crumbs again. Fry in deep, hot fat (olive oil, salad oil or vegetable shortening) only long enough to brown the crumb coating. Remove stalks carefully from fat and drain on white paper kitchen towels. Serve piping hot.

Mr. Flynn's cook suggested serving Hollandaise Sauce with this vegetable dish, or a cream sauce if you prefer not to attempt the former. However, I found that any sauce was superfluous because asparagus prepared in this manner is quite distinctive enough in itself without need for further embellishment.

Our next port of call is England where they turn out, says Errol, a delicious dish composed of the most incredible combination of ingredients and justly named "English Jumble Pie." This is a main course, not a dessert feature, since it contains a large proportion of meat and eggs, as well as apples. All meat pies, according to Errol, are pretty special—with this particular variety well at the head of the procession. In fact, all Englishmen grow lyric in its praise and even our adventurous Irishman admitted that his country's most famous dish cannot compare with it. That's why I've included this recipe instead of one for Irish Stew in the monthly leaflet. Sorry I did not have room for both, but we have still other countries to visit and one recipe must suffice for the British Isles.

WITH an utter disregard of time and space we next fly on over to Russia for Meat Stuffed Cabbage and drop down into Germany for good old Apple Strudel. Both recipes are worth having and are yours for the asking. Incidentally, Errol is particularly fond of most Russian and German dishes and thinks pumpernickel with sweet butter is pretty choice and Blinis with Sour Cream and Caviar the perfect beginning for a formal dinner.

Our next hop is a long one since we must travel from Europe to Bombay where Curry of Bombay Duck is Errol's idea of "something swell." However, speaking of ideas, he hasn't any idea how they make this dish so we'll not stop long here.

Nor would I wish to suggest for us stay-at-homes such things as sharks' fins and sea slugs which are considered great delicacies in the Far East and which this amazing Flynn fellow has not only eaten but has also caught and sold during one phase of his adventurous career!

Once again our magic carpet moves on and we approach the Western Hemisphere in a long-distance hop that would make the China Clipper envious. And so we reach Havana to partake of a baked fish combination that staggers the imagination of such conservative cooks as myself; that is, until I had tried it and then I was not only convinced but enthusiastic. Fish with bananas, pimientos and green peppers—think of that! But don't just think about it; try it. Here's the recipe, vouched for by Mr. Flynn and given to you with the unqualified endorsement of your Modern Hostess.

BAKED FISH HAVANAISE

Use any large, mild fish. (Tested successfully with Sea Bass.) It should weigh approximately 3½ pounds after removing head, fins and scales.

3½ pounds fish
2 teaspoons olive oil
2 green peppers, chopped fine
2 tablespoons butter
salt, pepper
juice of one lemon
3 ripe bananas
2 pimientos

Split the fish in two down the back, after removing head, fins and scales. Remove backbone and place fish in oiled baking pan. Season fish liberally with salt and pepper, then sprinkle with juice of ½ lemon and allow to stand for 20 minutes. Meanwhile heat olive oil in a saucepan, add finely chopped green peppers and cook until peppers are soft, stirring to prevent burning. Add butter to peppers and mash together to a pulp in a wooden bowl, using a potato masher. Press pulp through a sieve, then spread it over the fish. Cover entire fish in lengthwise rows with thinly sliced bananas. Spread the pimientos, cut into thin strips, over the fruit, crosswise. Sprinkle with a little more salt and pepper and the juice of the remaining ½ lemon. Cover all with brown paper greased on both sides, and bake in moderate oven (375° F.) 45 minutes, basting occasionally. Remove carefully to hot platter, garnish with parsley and lemon slices and serve immediately.

THIS has been a comparatively short journey, when you think how far we've travelled. Here we are back in Hollywood, seated once more at a prosaic lunch table within a few feet of the sound stages. On the plate before me is the Mexican Tamale Loaf with the rich sauce whose flavor denotes a Spanish inspiration. In my notebook are still other recipes more closely identified with Mr. Flynn. On the tablecloth are strange pencil markings indicating in the sketchiest form the interesting imaginary journey we have just made. And opposite me is Errol Flynn, a far away look in his eyes as though he were already visualizing the next journey of adventure and the next unusual repast under distant, and probably tropical, skies

As a parting tribute to Mr. Flynn's good taste and as a proof of his high standing as a gourmet, I want to give you his "Favorite Menu" just as he outlined it to me.

DINNER DE LUXE
Blinis with Caviar and Sour Cream
Turtle Soup with Sherry and Wafers
Baked Fish Havanaise
Quail on Toast with Fresh Mushrooms
French Fried Asparagus Artichoke Sauté
Endive and Beet Salad
Crêpes Suzette
Demi-tasse Napoleon Brandy

Good gracious! Isn't that fancy and far and away too difficult for the average housewife? So, instead of the foods listed on this menu, I am giving you in the leaflet, as I promised, the Mexican Tamale Loaf with its Spanish Sauce, the Russian Cabbage, German Apple Strudel, and English Meat Pie; all outstanding favorites of this romantic adventurer.

Send in your coupon promptly and treat yourself, your family and your friends to a culinary cruise with Errol Flynn.

The Hair Problem

more important, keep up the massage. Rotate your scalp with your fingers, ten minutes every day.

Shampoo your hair once a week if it's oily. Use the strained juice of a lemon in the last rinsing water, if your hair is blonde or light brown; half a teacup full of vinegar if your hair is dark or red. Or a half teaspoon full of bicarbonate of soda. All these things tend to dry the scalp.

Brushing will remove much excess oil. You can, if you like, put absorbent cotton on the bristles of your brush. Change the cotton a couple of times as you give your hair a thorough dry cleansing.

A little powdered orris root is a great thing now and then. It's not to be regarded as a substitute for a shampoo, but as an emergency cleanser and oil-reducer, it can work wonders. You can buy it at any drugstore. It has a pleasant, clean fragrance. Dip your brush into it and brush it thoroughly through your hair, removing every trace before you have finished. 'Tis especially practical for light hair which is afflicted with an oily condition.

It won't hurt a particle to use any good, nationally advertised hair tonic that is on the market. Massage same into your scalp. Almost every tonic contains a little alcohol, and this is drying, too.

If the oily condition keeps up—real bad—after a reasonable course of home treatment, or if your scalp itches excessively and your hair falls out to a great extent, hie yourself to the very best barber, beauty parlor or hair specialist you can locate and find out what's the trouble. Do go to a good place, because a cheap operator will only give you a line of hooey and do you more harm than good.

Dry hair, of course, needs "planty" oil and plenty of the stimulation that comes from massage. If your hair is dry, use a very soft brush and use it gently. Dry hair is brittle and you don't want to break off more than you must. After a shampoo, use a little brilliantine. Never use any tonic that contains alcohol, but there are fragrant oily stimulants and salves, which I'll tell you about if you care to write me. Shampoo your hair once every two weeks, at the oftenest. If you live in a nice, clean city or town, you can go three weeks or even a month. Gentle brushing will cleanse your hair of ordinary dust.

If you're thinking of getting that next permanent wave, take time to condition your hair first, whether it's dry or oily. Make the best of things with finger waves—or let the hair go straight for a while. A permanent wave on top of an abnormal scalp condition is apt to cause a peck of trouble.

And now let's speak of things that are more fun. Like what to do with your hair after it's all washed and massaged and brushed and everything. There are some pictures at the beginning of the article that may give you a few ideas. If you're not handy at fixing your hair yourself, tote the magazine down to your favorite beauty operator and say, "Hey, can you fix my hair like that?" But read the rest of this article first, because I have something to say about types and suitability and stuff.

Remember the wise saying, "Know thyself." Know what your hair will do and what it won't do. Some hair is adaptable—some isn't. Some girls can cut bangs and have them all curled up fancy for a party, say, and comb them neatly back next morning for the office and they'll stay back, to be brought forth again for another festive occasion. Another girl would have to wear bangs all the time, or look untidy until they grew out.

If your hair is adaptable, you don't need much advice from me. If it isn't, let me give you this advice: you must find a fairly conservative, becoming coiffure that you can wear all the time. If you make up your mind to a change of part, or style of cut, or decide to go in for some stunt that's a little rakish, like the bangs or a coxcomb or some little side curls—be good and sure your mind is made up and be prepared to wear your hair that way for quite a while. For evening, be thankful that ornaments are in vogue. If you're a little thing, wear a small ornament—nothing more spectacular than the clip Lily Pons is wearing on page 52. The wreaths of flowers and coyer adornments are very pretty for young girls. Taller people—older girls— if you can't get away with the more sophisticated hair ornaments you are seeing these days in all the shop windows and all the magazines—wear nothing in your nice, shining, well-groomed locks.

The Frances Farmer hair-do on page 53 is a fine, classic example that you'd go a long way to beat. The center part—the soft, deep waves at the temples, the flatness at the crown and over the ears, and the back hair in a simple roll or—if the hair is long—in a horizontal figure eight or butterfly knot . . . very neat, very chic and in the best of taste. The center part is becoming to everyone except those with a very wide face—they should part the hair exactly over the center of one eye. A thin face can be broadened by parting the hair way, way over to one side and making a shelf of hair across the brow. A very high forehead can be softened by depressing the hair deeply just by the part. Not quite a wave—just a softening effect. Don't be in too great haste, however, to cover up a high forehead. 'Tis an attractive feature. Look at Carole Lombard.

Ruby Keeler's new hair-do has a different quality to it, and it still is conservative enough to wear for everyday. The two I've not yet mentioned—Harlow's hair and Binnie Barnes' new blonde coiffure—are not, my frands, for run-of-the-mill living. Harlow's is too fluffy and Binnie's is too extreme for the office, for school, for going downtown to shop, or for a quiet evening with the husband, the radio, and the missing buttons on Junior's pants. They're party hair-dos—and very nice, too, each in its individual way, and should be saved for party occasions. The young girl with the pretty, naturally curly hair that reaches about to her shoulders, would certainly knock the stag line right out of its patent leather shoes if she appeared at a dance with the hair flowing loose and a simple wreath or band around the noodle. The tall, older girl might well cause a few husbands to get That Look in their eyes, if she had the hair dressed like Binnie's—and that's a professional job, children, so if you have aspirations in that direction, trot this little copy of MODERN SCREEN down to the best beauty parlor in town and have your hair done thataway.

Turning that roll of hair in the Barnes neck up the other way gives it the start of a popular and adaptable permanent that you might like to try. The hair is parted in the middle, and a roll curl made all around the head. It looks pretty neat that way. Then, you can part the hair on the side, if you like, leave just one rolled curl on your forehead, and comb the rest of the roll out, except at the back. Or you can part a section of front hair, comb it down on your forehead, and have a curled bang, with the hair off the ears and left rolled up in back. If you're the piquant type, you can comb the hair all up into a bunch of curls on top of your head for a party. It's a little nutty, but kinda cute. This roll permanent provides a basic coiffure that has many variations.

The big problem we modern wenches have, which our mamas did not, is that our hair must look smart as well as pretty. The main thing in mama's day was to have a great quantity of hair, piled into a huge pompadour, which showed none of the line of the head and was impossible as far as hats were concerned. There was no relation between the hair and the hat. Today, the relation of the hair and the hat is one of the main secrets of smartness above the neckline. That's why I say you can't use fixy and fussy hair-dos for everyday living. Hats demand simple, rather flat coiffures. That's why I say that a mass of fluffy curls reaching almost to the shoulders isn't smart nor in good taste. It makes you look as if you had no neck. Your hair should be off the face as much as possible for wear with hats. People want to see your face, after all, and not curtains of hair escaping from hat brims. On the screen, look at Irene Dunne, Kay Francis, Merle Oberon and Rosalind Russell for various solutions of the hat and hair problem.

With the very high hats, no hair must show on the forehead and as little as possible at the temples. A flat wave or curl at the ears is all right. With a sport pull-on, brimmed hat, tipped to one side, it's nice to see the waves on the other side, but they must be well under control. A large-brimmed hat allows for a little more freedom of the waves. I can't think of any kind of a hat that bangs can be worn with. With the tiny pillboxes and berets, too-long hair looks too theatrical to my way of thinking. And that reminds me of another "pernt."

The fluffy or elaborate coiffures you sometimes see on the screen—which may intrigue you momentarily—are cared for at approximately ten minute intervals by the studio hairdresser. Remember that. After every take, an expert tress-tender rushes over to Miss Movie Star and with professional fingers and a "cool" iron, fixes the hair just so. Otherwise, Miss Movie Star would wind up looking just as much of a mess as you would if you walked down the street in a high wind with the hair elaborately arranged.

There's one point I've been avoiding, but I suppose I might as well tackle it. And that's what's to do with the girls who still have long hair, and quite a tidy amount of it. The general opinion is that the entire female population of the country has gone short-hair, but there are a few of us left, wondering what to do with the big wad on the back of the dome. Yes—there's the confession. I've got long hair meself. I've refrained from cutting it for probably the same reasons you yourself haven't done so—because my husband likes long hair, and because I think that, mebbe, in the long run, it's less trouble than short hair and because—well, just because. If we want to have long hair, it's our business, isn't it? But it does complicate life sometimes, and here's what I've got to say on the subject:

Make up your mind to this: you're never going to look as smart in hats as the short-haired lass. You can't wear the cute, mad hats, so stop crying about it and don't waste any more money on extreme chapeaux. Conservative bonnets for you, sister, if you don't want to look like a freak. Medium brimmed felt sports hats for everyday wear, with a back elastic to go under the bun (hateful word!). In the summer time, wear big hats if you can—they're life savers for us long-haired girls. For gala occasions, some simple modification of the beret—not too small—with a back strap if possible. Do your hair in a figure eight, and pin the top of the figure eight over the backstrap.

Now then—just because we're doomed to go through life, apparently, with our long hair is no reason why we must eternally fix it in a utilitarian knot at the back of the head. I won't take up the space here to tell you about some coiffures for long hair which I've figured out, because it is kind of a specialized matter. Write to me—just say, "Send me your ideas for arranging long hair." Tell me how long your hair is, whether it's curly or straight, coarse or fine. And I'll see what I can do.

Another subject I must leave out of this article is the treatment and care of dyed hair. I have a few tips on that problem, if you're interested.

You others, now, can write to me, too, and welcome, but I do suggest that you look through Modern Screen at your favorite movie stars' coiffures, and look through the fashion magazines, too, and when you find a photograph or sketch of a hair-do that you think you could wear, try it yourself, if it's simple, and if you can't manage it, take the picture to a hairdresser and see what can be done about it. On t'other hand, if your hair looks pretty, becoming and in good taste the way it is, don't be in a tizzy to change it, just for the sake of changing.

And now in closing, here's a make-up stunt that I've picked up since last month's article and want to pass along to you. It's known as the ice trick. Your face is all made up, see, and you're just before going out. You've put on a generous quantity of powder—pressed it on, I hope, rather than rubbing it in. And you've removed the excess with a powder brush (shaving brushes are just swell for powder brushes, if you want to know) or a bit of clean cotton. Fine. You look, too, too divine. But how will you look at 2 a. m.? This is where the ice trick comes in. Once you've tried it, you'll thank me.

Take a piece of ice and let it melt a bit so's the corners aren't sharp. Then rub it, gently but thoroughly, all over the face. Feel the glow come up into your cheeks. Go on—don't be afraid. You won't ruin the paint job. Now—take a piece of cleansing tissue or a soft cloth and pat the moisture away, very gently. See what it does? It kind of "mats" the make-up. It gives you a glow in your cheeks. And it keeps your make-up looking just simply swell for hours and hours! I've done it every evening I've been out since I heard about it. It really works.

Mary Marshall is now signing off, and asking you to write her for any personal information you would like to have. The address is Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. Enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope, please. And do forgive me—you who have been waiting for replies—for the long delay. You'll get an answer, all right, even if you have had to wait a spell.

"She taught me consideration for others. Like many girls, I thought that actresses were sort of special, were exempt from conventional creeds and customs.

GARBO taught me how young and ignorant that point of view really is. By her unfailing promptitude, by her courtesy to the men working on the sets, by being always letter-perfect in her lines and by her generosity to those working with her, she gave me a standard I know I shall never lose.

"She has no petty fears about footage and camera angles and whether or not she is getting more, as star, than members of the supporting cast. She does her work thoroughly and she expects others to do the same and may the best man win!

"Whatever simplicity and honesty I put into my role in 'Ah, Wilderness' is due to her. I don't think," said Cecilia, "that I would have been up to it if I hadn't had the experience of working with Garbo.

"She taught me poise, too. She taught me how much more beautiful and impressive it is to bear yourself quietly with dignity and without circus show-off tactics.

"I shall walk quietly all of my days because of Garbo," said this quiet child.

"And she taught me," smiled Cecilia, "how to relax. Between scenes Garbo always retired to her dressing-room or sat on the sidelines watching, relaxed in every nerve and muscle. She can be more still than any human being I have ever seen. Her composure is more beautiful than the most animated motion. When she goes into an emotional scene, she is like a being charged and recharged; she is all alive and there is fire and force and depth back of it. She hasn't frittered it all away on nothings. She taught me to save myself for emotional scenes, in real life as well as on the screen. She taught me not to break myself up into little pieces for trivialities.

"She taught me to be immaculate, which is quite a different thing from being 'dressy'. I have never seen anyone more immaculate than Garbo. Her shining, brushed hair, her clean strong hands, without nail polish or benefit of beauty parlor—if ever I thought it amusing to paint my nails like a Comanche Indian's, or frizz my hair or wear extreme styles, I got well over it, thanks to her. No, she doesn't 'fix up' in the beauty parlor sense of the word, but she is so shiningly groomed that it makes nail polish and waved hair and make-up seem cheap by comparison.

"She taught me the beauty and the wisdom of tact. She never gives advice to younger, newer players who are working on her pictures. I know some actresses and actors who are always telling you that you should do a scene this way or that way or hadn't you, perhaps, better try it the other way; they really serve mostly to make you self-conscious.

Garbo is silent. She never gives one an inferiority complex. She seems to expect people to live up to what they are supposed to do.

I CAN'T ever be like Garbo physically," said Cecilia, regretfully, "even though I did resemble her enough to play her sister. I do have almost exactly the same coloring, though. I have gray eyes and so has she. We have the same shade of pale brown hair. Our skin is much the same in tone and texture. People tell me we have something of the same quality in our voices, I am short whereas she is tall. I have a round face, though I have hopes that it will thin out in time.

"Even though I can't look much like her, I can try to be like her inside," said Cecilia, "and I do. I know that I sound like a Garbo fan. Well, I am a Garbo fan. Of course, being a Garbo fan means loving and admiring Garbo and only by intense admiration are we ever stirred enough to try to be like the object of our admiration.

"I know that I've lost all temptation to copy or imitate anyone. Please don't misunderstand—I don't mean that I'm trying to look or to act like Garbo. That would be ridiculous. If I were trying that then Garbo wouldn't really have taught me anything at all. No, what I am trying to do is to be as honest in my work and in my personal life as Garbo is in hers, to have in my way the same integrity and courage she has in hers.

"She taught me not to be afraid of anything—not even humdrum practical truths about oneself. I'm a good cook, for instance, if I do say so. When I'm not working I keep house for my mother, my brother and myself. I used to keep it for my sister, Linda, too, before she married and had a baby. Linda is also in pictures.

"And when I say that I keep house, I mean keep house, not just direct a servant. We don't have one. We did have one for a time but she made mother so nervous that we let her go. Mother likes to fuss about the house and do things her own way and so do I. And I cook and scrub floors and do some washing and ironing and just have a woman in to do the heavy laundry.

"A few weeks ago a director called me from the studio and asked me to come over for an interview. He said, 'Are you busy? What are you doing?' I told him I was scrubbing the kitchen floor. He thought he hadn't heard me right and he said, 'I don't get you—you're doing what?' I told him again and he laughed and said that he didn't believe me. But I was. He should have seen me and he'd have believed me all right—I had on an old house dress and no shoes and stockings and my hair and hands and face were a sight!

"Well, there was a time when I wouldn't have admitted to this. I would have thought that a movie actress shouldn't let it out that she even knows there are floors to be scrubbed and meals to be cooked.

But if Garbo talked she would admit practical truths about herself, I'm sure of that. She probably doesn't scrub floors nowadays, perhaps she never did. But what I'm trying to explain is that Garbo would never be ashamed of any honest work she did, no matter what.

"But for yourself?" I asked this child of the round face, composed young mouth, grave gray eyes? "You don't really want to live the solitary life of Garbo, certainly? Doesn't love enter into your scheme of things?" (And I thought of the Hollywood rumors that Cecilia and Eric Linden were "hearting.") "Don't you want marriage and babies and a home?"

"Of course, I do," said Cecilia. "I want children more than I want anything else. I want to marry and to have a home. I'd gladly give up my whole career for home and marriage if those things come to me—."

"Do you mind," I said, "if I ask you a really personal question, since the columnists have been personal about it anyway? Were you or are you engaged to Eric Linden?"

"No," Cecilia said, "we do go out together quite a lot. We have so much in common. Not only our work but liking to be alone, not in a crowd, liking the same books and liking to talk about books, all that sort of thing. But we are not engaged.

"I hope things work out happily and successfully for me. If they don't, I hope I will have learned from Garbo to take loneliness with courage, and heartbreak with dignity."

Five-Star Capers

League of Nations. If this produced perplexity at first, it brought a wonderful revelation after the first few days, when the movie staff realized that the five lively, almost impersonal, babies, had become divine and devilish little character actresses during their year's absence.

Director Taurog—with his staff of eighty players, technicians, wardrobe mistresses and what-not—arrived in Callander with a caravan of cars and trucks that looked like a strange exploring expedition combined with a comic opera troupe, stranded in the Far North. They were soon swallowed up, however, in the great throng of curious people who had come from almost every city and hamlet from all over the American continent—farmer families in blue denims, French Canucks in their black holiday best, flappers in their shortest shorts, city slickers and yokels in all that ultra sports costumes will do to them, mothers, sweethearts and swains, wives and grandmothers, children and grandchildren being lugged along or carried in arms.

It wasn't very long before Taurog was watching the "babies"—as Dr. Dafoe always calls the Quints—in a "natural tryout" and in a scene that would be hard to beat even though it were staged. It was nearing the zero hour of two when the five little Dionnes were scheduled to appear for their period of play. The line of onlookers had formed, ready to crash the gate the moment it should be opened. Many had remained just outside the woven-wire fence that enclosed the "hospital" grounds, every eye focussed in the direction of the little white house on the bluff where the children live with their nurses.

Suddenly, an "Oh-h! Here they come!" rang through the throng, as a tiny figure in pink popped out of the door and toddled, as fast as its slightly-bowed legs would permit, around the corner. This was Yvonne, clad in pink rompers, running away! Emilie followed, in blue, taking the opposite direction. Annette, in mauve, came next, closely pursued by the nurse. When caught, they each sprawled out flat and had to be carried part way. Cecile, in green, and Marie, in red, however, were legging it as fast they could towards the great new scientific playground, bent upon gathering up all the toys before the others could reach them. The crowd, awed at first, now chortled with delight, until the last of the young ones disappeared within the enclosure; then everybody stampeded to get into line.

WE were accorded privileges by the Quints' Special Police and allowed to enter a side door and stand at a point where we could observe the whole show—both the five little performers and the crowds as they were admitted at the far end of the shed through turn-stiles. The playground was like an horseshoe-shaped arena, surrounded on two sides by silver-screen covered glass. Four hundred persons at a time were allowed in, two hundred lining up with their faces against the glass on either side. Silence was requested by the police, so that the Quints neither saw nor heard the spectators who were allowed to gaze to their hearts' content for two minutes and then were hustled towards the exits. On their way out of the yards every other woman surreptitiously picked up one of the "Magic Pebbles," five hundred pounds of which are placed in a long box near the gate every day.

The next day the shooting of the picture began. While it is true that Norman Taurog is nominally director, Dr. Roy Dafoe is the supreme boss. Nothing can happen concerning the Quintuplets, until he has been duly consulted and nods his head in approval. Everything must be natural; nothing forced or strained. Only four persons are permitted even within touching distance of the babies. The others must, whenever possible, keep out of sight. The moment the little ones show the slightest sign of fatigue or begin to yawn, the "rehearsal" is off. Dorothy Peterson, as Nurse Kennedy, and Jean Hersholt, impersonating Dr. Dafoe, are accorded the intimacies with these little sweethearts of the world that Dr. Dafoe himself and the two French Canadian nurses alone enjoy.

"Free action," unknown to Hollywood, is therefore permitted in the Dionnes' case. Curiously, or not, no scenarialized scenes could possibly have possessed greater charm or effectiveness. As for humor, every action of these starlets seems to have a laugh in it. It is here that those intimate close-ups, unseen by the crowd, take place.

Emilie is talking, in her quaint French Canadian baby talk, to Yvonne, and Yvonne is supposed to be listening, according to the scenario. But Yvonne will not listen. She not only talks back to Emilie, but she gives her a swat. In fact, she actually puts a punch in an otherwise dull scene, as it turns out. Annette has really been taught to "play" the toy piano in a ladylike way and everybody is on his toes as she sits down of her own volition and seems on the point of acting—when suddenly, she begins pounding the lights out of the instrument and pushes it over, for bad measure. Free action again, and successful, because it is intrinsically dramatic.

Dorothy Peterson, as Nurse Kennedy, has surreptitiously been rehearsing a scene several times with little Marie, in which the child sweetly gives her Teddy a spoonful of her well-advertised porridge. The scene is all set for the camera with interested parties looking on smilingly, when dear little Marie lets Teddy Bear have the bowl all over his face and head. Not nice, perhaps, but, oh, what a kick to it, especially when Marie looks up and laughs mischievously.

Then, there was the tea party, that was all planned out as cute as a bug's ear. Little Cecile did her part charmingly, dragging up the small white chairs and placing them exactly where they should be at the miniature white table, two at each side and one at the head. The scene was perfect; the little group of spectators breathless. Then, just as the four little teasers were about to take their places, little Annette, with just the right naughty twinkle in her eye, toddled up and upset the chairs one by one. There was a tense moment, then everybody laughed, in which the five little actresses joined. It was fraught with all the best elements of good theatre—crisis, climax, tension, surprise, reaction—drama!

THE first scene shot in the new scientific playground, with an audience of four hundred concealed behind the patent glass gallery, was just as unexpected, except that it savored more of a free-for-all circus than drama. The stage had been set, filled with five great rubber balls, five little wagons, five sand pails and shovels, and other miscellaneous toys in fives. The scene was "A Bathing Beach Somewhere in Canada." Realism was provided by a huge heap of fine white sea sand and a little shore surrounding the permanent concrete pool in the center of the yard. The five young ladies had been fitted out to meet this aquatic occasion in the height of fashion, each wearing a bathing suit of a different color, each suit consisting of baggy trunks, held up by white suspenders over their broad brown backs, with an enormous white bow as trimming. Their plump legs and feet were bare. The cos- a different color, each suit consisting of poke-bonnet hats to match their panties.

All five burst into the arena at once, hell-bent for one ball, one pail and one shovel, over which they wrestled until one would gain possession and then the others would rush towards another single article. There was one tiny tournament of shovels that threatened to become sanguinary until the nurse declared a forced peace. Thus thwarted, Yvonne and Emilie carefully descended into the foot-deep ocean and stood gasping under the fountain stream for a moment, before they were seized with a bright idea. Tearing off their bonnets they began scooping up the water in them and drinking it. The horrified nurse, seeing a billion germs flowing into the innards of two of her precious darlings, rushed pell-mell, ankle-deep into the sea before they could drink more than a pint of it! We hope the camera caught this scene; it was so deliciously, juvenilely human.

However, there is another scene, that for sheer innocent juvenile charm has no superior on the screen. We must first fix in our minds the fact that these five little prisoners of biological science, hedged in by the tender but strict care of an unswerving master doctor, sheltering them from any contamination with a too-loving world, have never been off their small fenced-in reservation. Except once, on September 21, 1934. On that rainy day they had been carried in their incubators some five hundred feet, from the tumble-down Dionne home across the road to their newly-built

An Alka-Seltzer Tablet in a glass of water makes a pleasant-tasting, alkalizing solution which contains an analgesic (sodium acetyl salicylate). You drink it and it does two important things. First, because of the analgesic, it brings quick, welcome relief from your discomfort—and then because it is also alkalizing in its nature Alka-Seltzer helps correct the cause of the trouble when associated with an excess acid condition.

"hospital." They were then five months old; little wraiths battling with intestinal toxemia with only a beggar's chance of pulling through. Today, little Marie—who had been the tiniest—is 31½ inches tall. All of them are as lively as five crickets, showing 16 or 18 teeth each when they laugh. Fine, healthy specimens of humanity, fit to enjoy to the utmost this great excursion in store for them. Five rich little poor girls about to realize what would be the sweetest dream of a princess.

Hollywood had brought them a veritable heaven in the form of dresses and gowns for every occasion, costumes, shoes, bonnets—in quintuplicate. The whole land had been combed until five perfectly-matched Shetland ponies had been found. A pony cart had been built for each of them and, for this great occasion, five little uniformed coachmen had been furnished. And so the cavalcade set out down the lonely road towards Callander on a fairy ride of a thousand feet and back. Thus far, this has been the climax in the lives of the Quintuplets—an unforgettable episode in the moving picture of their intimate life, called "Reunion."

Taking Irene Dunne for a Ride!

Dunne traveled on her way up to fame. I mean, you'd have to change buses, get transfers so many times. Of course, figuratively speaking, that is what Irene did, for the road to fame has many detours as you may soon see.

We took a taxi. And we had fun. And I learned about Irene Dunne.

"This," she told me as we craned our necks out of the cab, to gaze up at the Pennsylvania Hotel, "was where I stayed when I first came to the big city from Madison, Indiana, and Louisville, Kentucky. I was only sixteen years old, filled with ambition and hope for the future. I had been told by my teachers and all who had heard me sing that I was destined to become a great opera singer. I know I believed it myself.

"And so, I stood in the windows of my room on the fourteenth floor and looked out over the towers of this great city which I was seeing for the first time, and dreamed great dreams of what it was to mean to me.

I WAS having a delightful time letting my imagination soar to heights, when puff, came a gust of wind and my second best silk dress which I had hung in the window to let the breeze blow out its wrinkles—no expensive hotel valet service for me!—blew right out the window.

"My, such a hubbub as ensued. I forgot my flights of fancy. I forgot everything but that I had to have that dress. I was going to wear it the next evening when I sang before delegates to a national steel convention in Atlantic City. A bellhop did find it down in the alley after about a half-hour's search—a bit bedraggled and wrinkled, but my dress.

"I think of that incident often. It's typical of life, isn't it? You think everything is wonderful and splendid and the future stretches ahead of you in glorious panorama, when puff, comes a gust of wind or realism, smacking you right down to earth where honest work goes on.

"But as I day-dreamed, looking out that window, I saw myself a great diva at the Metropolitan Opera House. No, I've never sung at the Met. Many people think that I have, but I never have been so fortunate. Let's go by and look at it, it's at 39th Street. Driver, the Met!"

We didn't say anything for a minute. Then, "The Met—that's where I was to become famous—that is where my good friends and neighbors believed I was destined to become the great star of all time. They, who believed in me, gave me a beautiful feather fan with a tortoise shell handle just before I left home. It was to be my Met fan—I was to carry it when I made my debut.

"Well, I did carry it, but when I went to the Met to hear, not to sing, my first opera! It was at a Thanksgiving performance and Rosa Ponselle sang 'Aida.' Never in my life have I been so excited over music.

"Now, let's go practical for a minute. Let's go over toward Times Square where I learned about jobs, managers and rehearsals and had that sick feeling of being dropped out of a show just before the pay-checks were to start."

ENROUTE to the Selwyn Theatre building at 42nd Street, near Broadway, Irene pointed out the Roseland Dance Hall which she told me represented to her the heights of fun and gayety when she was that youngster from Kentucky. "We dined in a restaurant across the street and I looked at it and thought how beautiful it was. I planned to go dancing with a beau there some day."

"Did you?" I asked.

"No," she said. "That's something I never got around to do. Look, here's the Selwyn, where I applied for my first job from the Hammersteins. It was on that first trip and I carried a letter of introduction from a mutual friend. I was forty minutes late for my appointment but swept in like a prima donna. Arthur Hammerstein loves to tell the story on me now—but I didn't get the job. So I went back to Kentucky and the family sent me to a music school in Chicago. It probably was all for the best."

It also was in the Times Square section of New York, where so much glamor is discovered and sent forth to shine on the New York stage or in Hollywood, that Miss Dunne had her first meeting with the famous Ziegfeld, the man who was later to star her in "Showboat." She met him in an elevator in the Amsterdam Theatre building, on her way to rehearsal for a Dillingham show "The City Chap."

"He offered me a job and I turned him down—just think," she said, laughing. "When I noticed him looking closely at me, I paid no attention at all! I merely turned so that he got the best possible view of me at the best possible angle—and pretended to be interested in something else. He stared and stared, so I knew I had impressed him. Just a few minutes later, after I had begun rehearsal, his secretary arrived, wanting to know the name of the little girl in the blue dress and blue hat. Who was she and what did she do? Mr. Ziegfeld wanted to see her about a job. But I wasn't interested. I had a job, thank you, I told him."

Imagine a young prima donna pulling that on Ziegfeld! But it has been Irene Dunne's nature to be independent and proud. Perhaps it is her pride, coupled with the fierce determination always to be somebody, that is the real keynote of her character.

It looks like love and it is love —Anne Shirley and her big heart throb, Owen Davis, Jr., leave the Club Casanova.

Of course, she could afford to be independent. She will admit that, although she struggled to achieve and accomplish, she never did have the terrific economic struggle or the fight for bare existence that some of our stars have known. When she didn't work she could send home for money, for she came of a family of some means—a family which had taken so much pride in her vocal talents that it had sent her to good schools and good teachers, expecting her to be important in whatever she undertook to do. Irene became important, too. She never took anything but leading roles in shows. She fought for the best and got it. She was a prima donna and a leading lady from the beginning, partly because of her ability as a fine singer, partly because of this pride and determination.

A GIRL with less backbone, character and pride might easily have been spoiled by her advantages, and the fact that she could lean on her family. That Irene wasn't, that she rode through to success and achievement and is, today, one of the best-balanced individuals I know in Hollywood, is a tribute to her character.

Well, we drove on, still looking at Irene Dunne's past. There was the Globe Theatre where she had her name in electric lights for the first time, for a Dillingham show. And Bryant Hall, where she had so many heartbreaking rehearsals for shows which didn't open, or shows from which she was forced to drop out—such as "Sweetheart Time" with Eddie Buzzell.

Next we were on Fifth Avenue. There was St. Patrick's Cathedral where Irene goes to church—big, impressive, handsome, a famous landmark. Central Park, where Irene used to roller skate for exercise.

What Do You Do with Your Little Finger?

—when you pick up a glass or cup? . . . You know from watching others that charm and poise can be destroyed instantly by the misuse of hands. And by the same token, the correct use of your hands can become a tremendous social and business asset. Great actresses accomplish much of their poise by proper hand action.

The makers of Frostilla—the famous skin lotion that keeps hands, face and body smooth and lovely—asked Margery Wilson, the international authority on charm and poise, to tell

- how to hold a cigarette
- how to pick up cards
- how to shake hands
- and how to make hands behave to the best advantage on all occasions

Margery Wilson gives the authoritative answers to these and other questions in an illustrated booklet on How to Use Your Hands Correctly. Although this booklet is priced at 50c, we have arranged to present it without charge to Frostilla users in the United States and Canada until May 30th, 1937.

Just mail the front of a 35c, 50c or $1.00 Frostilla Fragrant Lotion box (or two fronts from 10c sizes) and your copy will be sent FREE.

Then the Lincoln building, where her husband, Doctor Griffin, has his office. The Biltmore Hotel where she first met the doctor. You know that story, of course, how they immediately were attracted to each other—he asked for her telephone number and she promptly gave it to him. Then he didn't call her for several months! She was pretty upset, but, when he did call, there was no maidenly stalling with, "I'm busy." Instead a prompt acceptance of his dinner invitation. They were married. And it was the dignified old Plaza Hotel where they had their wedding reception. (This was when Irene was going to retire from the stage and be a good wife for the rest of her life!) Soon we reached 85th Street and the apartment house where Irene and her mother lived for some time. It marked one of the happiest times in Irene's existence.

Why?

"Well, I paid the rent," she told me. "For the first time since I had been in New York I was making enough money and working regularly enough to be able to shoulder the financial responsibility that was mine. I was happy that I could pay back some of the money that the family had expended upon me. I remember, also, I used to practice singing like mad and as we were on a court my high notes echoed and re-echoed through the apartment house. One day while practicing, I was frightfully crushed when a woman yelled out, "Hire a hall!" She turned out later to be an important newspaper woman who since has become one of my great friends. It never pays to take any rebuff seriously, does it?"

We wound up back at the Pierre where Irene Dunne lives today when she is in New York.

What does she like best today—the New York where she fought her early battles, or Hollywood where she is famous and a star?

"Well, of course, first of all, I like to be where Doctor Griffin is," she told me. "That's the most important. I'm happiest when I am in New York with him or he is with me in Hollywood, but as comparative places to live, well . . .

"I dreaded leaving Hollywood to come to New York this last time. I thought of giving up my nice breakfasts in my patio and taking New York's rain and snow and sleet. Now that I'm here, I dread going back to Hollywood. I love New York as a town. We have our friends, made over a long period of time, we see them and enjoy them and we live a stimulating, interesting life.

"I feel as though, when I'm here, this is my permanent residence and I am not just on vacation. I feel as if I am a part of what is going on in the world of politics and finance. I meet and enjoy people who are active in those fields. But also, I go to openings and night clubs. We go a great deal. I don't know where you got the impression I live so quietly."

Well, maybe my impressions were wrong. Maybe Irene doesn't live so quietly, maybe it's because she doesn't do the usual Hollywood star-on-vacation, wear-a-wig and don't-let-anyone-see-me sort of thing, that I'm baffled about her. Perhaps it is because she has too much pride and good breeding to indulge in these cheap dramatics that I have been fooled into thinking she's a quiet person, living an uneventful life.

Perhaps she's just herself, Irene Dunne, a very nice individual who has made her way quietly and purposefully up through New York to Hollywood stardom and now goes about her own business without any monkeyshines and talks about it frankly, but minus histrionics.

You Appeal in Star Fashions

typifies the Bennett brand of smartness. There's nothing haphazard about Connie or her clothes.

And you would just languish over her accessories. Opening dresser drawers which are heavily scented, she showed me an array of handbags in a variety of materials and colors. In another drawer, neatly arranged, were belts—wide ones, vivid velvets, soft suedes and shining patents. And a hothouse load of artificial flowers which included large-petaled single flowers, tiny French bouquets and brightly blended corsages. Scarves are another big item in the Bennett accessory drawers—Connie has 'em in all sizes and designs made in chiffons, velvets, wool, suede, taffeta and crisp pique.

Constance is a very systematic lass and so she insisted upon summing up her fashion advice in ten concise points. I pass them on to you as she gave them to me and I think they are darn helpful.

Here goes:

"Dress with an eye for your own particular type. Don't dress too conciously with or against fashion."

"Choose your gowns with simplicity, your hats with sanity and your accessories with subtlety."

"Never follow fads. There is a difference between novelty and originality. The former is for women who allow others to think for them. The latter for those who think for themselves!"

"Give your costume complete coöperation! Walk gracefully, sit gracefully—even lounge gracefully."

(Incidentally, that is one of the best bits of advice you've ever had!)

"Do not wear colors just because they are new colors, wear them only if they are smart on you and if they flatter you. Colors should be semi-bright, not glaringly so."

"Be consistent in what looks best on you. If one gown flatters you more than another, copy it—twice, three times, as often as you like. And in various fabrics and colors. Repetition is never monotonous if it is smart repetition."

"Dramatize your dresses. Give them surprises—a daring back, a slashed skirt, a spectacular clip or belt-buckle."

"Combine value with vogue. Save your pennies if you must, but avoid cheap materials. Don't allow a momentary thrill for a dress to confuse your senses. How long will it thrill you? How well will it look the second time you wear it?"

"Dispense with fussy details. Remember that simplicity moulds the figure."

"Cultivate personality, discover your own type, find a style to agree with it, and develop the courage to express it!"

And because Connie Bennett practices what she preaches, her clothes have appeal for you. From her wardrobe she selected three outfits which embrace her ten fashion pointers—each of these three has something which is adaptable to you, whether or not you are specifically a Constance Bennett type.

There's the street dress of waffle plaid-wool in a soft dusty rose shade. Connie points this out as an example of what she means by a simple dress dramatized by its accessory details. The neckline, hidden under her beautiful fur scarf, in the picture, has an Ascot scarf collar. The sleeves are long and fitted with cuffs of the material. Except for its unusual fabric, it would be a plain dress, but instead it is lifted out of the average class by the addition of a wide brown suede sash, looped over and held by an enormous gold safety pin. To tie up with the belt, she selects a brown suede bag with gold chain handle, a brown antelope hat with peaked crown and a giddy quill of the same leather, brown suede gloves and matching oxfords with the new high instep cut emphasized by an open lacing—these have neither toes, nor backs.

For afternoon dates, when she's not making a picture, Connie's pet outfit is a severe black velvet dress that looks like a coat. It has a concealed zipper all the way down the front. Into the V neck of this she tucks a rose colored scarf when she wears that sassy black velvet topper with the rose trim and flaring veil. The close-up shows you the hat as well as the other accessories which go with this.

Connie probably paid a fortune for her Iris blue taffeta dinner gown, but there's not a gal among you that couldn't have a copy of it—it's that simple and copyable from its short puffed sleeves held up by wide, buttoned bands to the elegant sweep of its full skirt. In the picture, the shadows hide the clever shoulder detail but I'll describe it because it's another one of those things you can make yourself with a couple of yards of velvet ribbon. It's a corsage made by clustering a series of crimson velvet bows, tied either large or small, as you like best. A swell color contrast to the Iris blue, too, isn't it?

All three of the Bennett costumes shown can be converted into usable ideas for each of you—and that applies as much to the girl who can't sew a stitch as to the one who can. The only difference being that the girl who can't sew has to trick up her ready-made clothes, while the girl who is needle-wise, can copy every minute detail if she likes.

The next day I hied myself over to the Cedric Gibbons' modern homestead. Mrs. G., Dolores Del Rio, has surrounded herself with the sort of house she has to dress up to. I don't mean that she has to run around all set for a party from morn to night, but she can't go old-fashioned and clinging vine in such a setting of brisk modernity. As a result, her wardrobe has that twentieth century tempo that is very stimulating.

Just as with Constance, the mention of clothes, brought us face to face with the Del Rio closets and boudoir, jammed with clothes and accessories. Her dressing-room is white carpeted and mirror-walled. Revolving doors on her closets swing around to reveal her clothes arranged according to their types. For instance, one section contains neat hangers full of satin, velvet, silver and gold cloth pajamas. Another displays hanger upon hanger full of wool, gabardine and broadcloth suits. In the same file-like precision you can see afternoon, cocktail and evening gowns. All the evening gowns hang from quilted hangers.

Each season Dolores picks one color to dominate her whole wardrobe. Does that sound familiar to you? It seems to me as if I am always dinning that in as the shortest cut to economical smartness! Anyway, this winter, she has picked black—black for morning, afternoon and evening clothes—with only occasional diversion such as a vivid splash of color on a blouse, in a handkerchief, a petticoat or a scarf. Now and then gold or silver metal cloth for evening.

Here's a utility bag that is as smart as a handbag. It's made by one of the big rubber goods companies and comes in moire silk of various colors. It can be carried by its chain or packed flat in a suitcase. It's rubber lined.

While she obligingly dragged clothes out of the closet to illustrate a point, we discussed skirt-lengths, trims, lines and accessories, designers, colors, short and tall women, stout and thin. About skirts, she said:

"Skirts—yes—they are going to be shorter and shorter, but women must be guided by what will become their own limbs—not by how short others may wear them. Irregular hemlines will be invaluable aids to those who must be wary.

"There are three factors most important to be considered in selecting a correct wardrobe," she continued. "Line, of course, is first. Color next, and specialty of style last. No matter how becoming a line may be, the wrong color or an unflattering style feature will destroy its beauty. It is important that all three be combined carefully for the perfect results.

"Proof of a woman's technique in choosing her clothes should be her personality when she wears it. She should present a different personality in tailored costume than in evening ones. Thus, the original and clever dresser may have as many moods as she has costumes!"

AND no one is more versatile on this latter point than Dolores herself. Just look at the completely different effect she achieves in the two costumes pictured. Although her evening gown of silver metal cloth bordered with black fur is severely simple, it manages to give her a rather stately, sophisticated air. This general type of evening dress is always good regardless of changing modes. Whereas, the equally simple black crepe afternoon gown, by means of its full swing skirt, short puffed sleeves and high neckline, makes Dolores look young and rather naïve. This dress follows the favorite peasant trend, an effect which is further stressed by the wide suede belt, the high-crowned and ribbon-trimmed turban and the unusual sabot shoes. The only touch of color in this whole ensemble is the lipstick red ribbon trim on the turban.

Just as the Bennett costumes were easy to adapt or copy for your own needs, so are these two Del Rio models. Any girl with a flair for sewing, could make them. Why not try? It would be fun.

Dolores has a fund of good, sensible fashion axioms. Showing me her many and distinctive accessories, she said:

"Hats and accessories should be chosen to accent a costume's feature as well as to blend in color and design. More and more we find that designers are emphasizing this. For instance, buttons on a dress may be repeated again on a hat or a bag. Belt buckles may be repeated on shoes or a bag, even gloves.

"The psychology of color is as interesting a subject as clothes themselves. I definitely believe colors reflect favorably or unfavorably upon a woman's disposition as well as on her personality. Instinctively, women should know which color inspires them the most—and if their instinct fails to serve them in this respect, they would not be amiss to consult a student of color psychology. Personally, I prefer to make up my wardrobe along one definite color. Last season I had everything white, this year, it's black instead. A black and white combination is one of my favorites."

And all you girls with the black-haired, black-eyed Del Rio coloring could well cultivate some similar basic color scheme to stress your individuality.

"Every woman has some outstanding feature," she continued. "Naturally, in emphasizing our good points, we can more gracefully overcome our bad ones. Too thin backs and arms should be covered gracefully, no matter how otherwise perfect a dress may be for the wearer. Added touches, for the purpose of concealing less attractive features, will not detract from style or silhouette if carefully and expertly designed."

So there you have answers to many of the questions you write in to ask me about—answers which carry the weight of being the real style credo of two of the most perfectly groomed and smartly dressed stars in all Hollywood. And since these and other stars have such grand and practical tips up their sleeves, why don't you write in to me, telling me what questions you would like most to have answered by some star? I will make up a questionnaire of your ideas, submit it to some star, famous for her smartness, and then publish the answers to your combined questionnaire in some future article. So write in your question, but stick to fashion, remember, and let's make up a really helpful group of questions to send on to Hollywood!

One in a Million!

inclination to conceal that background. "Why should I?" he asked, smiling. "The saloons were good saloons, and my father was a good man."

Felix Ameche had ideas about the education his eldest son should have. When Don had finished the seventh grade in Kenosha, his father sent him off to St. Berchman's Seminary in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. He remained there through his first year in high school. And that was where he first wondered what he would do with his life.

"I responded to the suggestion of my surroundings," he said. "I thought of the priesthood until I discovered how much studying it would take. Then I knew it wasn't for me."

That, also, was where he did his first bit of acting.

"I played the part of the Blessed Mother in the Christmas play the boys put on. And there's rather an amusing story connected with that.

"One of my duties was to help put the smaller boys to bed. That involved considerable rough-housing before the lights went out. And three days before the play was to be given, what should happen during one of those sessions, but that I should get kicked in the eye. I developed a beautiful shiner.

"By the day of the play, it was hardly noticeable. Then, that day, we had a fire drill. I ran down the fire escape and tore around the corner of the building. As I rounded the corner, I bumped into the janitor, who was coming toward me with a pipe in his mouth. The pipe hit me in the eye. The same eye was blacked all over again. I'm probably the one and only actor who ever played the Blessed Mother with a black eye!"

From St. Berchman's he went to Columbia Academy in Dubuque for three years; thence, into Columbia College for a year and a half. There he met the man who is his greatest friend today, Father Maurice Sheehy. He was the first discoverer of Don Ameche.

The ex-newspaperman-turned-priest saw potentialities in the tall, handsome boy who didn't like to study. He encouraged him to enter and to win elocution contests. He gave him the idea of a law career.

Father Sheehy, in his friendship, also did something else for Don. He took him along one night when he went calling on some old friends named Prendergast. He introduced Don to tall, fair-haired Honore Prendergast. He simplified their falling in love six years later, when they met again.

"I wanted to study law, and Columbia had no pre-law course. So I transferred to Marquette. I tried pre-law and it didn't work out. I couldn't settle down to study; I was too full of play. I hated to go to bed—I still hate to go to bed—but I wasn't staying up to study. I was reading every kind of book except text-books. I was having dates three or four a week, with three or four different girls.

"Meanwhile, I was cutting classes right and left, so that I could go to the movies. I saw two or three a day, on my good days. I loved them. I had Hollywood on my mind even then—only I didn't know what to do about it."

At the end of the year, when the Dean caught a glimpse of the Ameche grades, Don received a little note that said, "We regret to inform you that you have failed to pass the required number of courses. Therefore, etc."

"From there, I went to Georgetown University in Washington, D. C. for a half-year—and quit before exams. It was senseless, my trying them. My next stop was at the University of Wisconsin, at Madison—where Mother and Dad had more of a chance to keep an eye on me. Poor Mother and Dad! They must have wondered what they had ever done to deserve me.

"Wisconsin had a fine Little Theatre, and a fine director—William Troutman. I owe a great deal to him. He helped to make an actor of me.

"I had done a little acting at Columbia, but none since. Now I became interested as I never had been before. I played the leads in a succession of plays there—plays like 'The Devil's Disciple,' 'Liliom,' 'Young Woodley,' 'Cradle Song,' 'Outward Bound.'

"There was also a good little stock company playing in Madison, the Jackson Stock Company. Thanksgiving Day morning, 1928, the leading man and the second lead were in an automobile smash-up. The leading man had a broken arm, but he could go on at the matinee. The other man couldn't. He was in the hospital with a badly cut head. They had to find someone to replace him in a hurry.

"A friend of a friend of mine told the manager about me. The manager didn't know if I could do the part, but he had to take the chance. It wasn't a matter of choice. There wasn't anybody else available."

That was his first professional appearance. And, note, a friend was responsible for it.

"After that, I stayed with them, making enough to keep me going until the first week in June. Then I resigned from the University. Exams were coming up again. Acting was interfering with my studying. Studying wasn't interfering with my acting."

And what did his mother and father say to all this?

"They weren't too much impressed when I first started out. But neither one ever said a word, either way. They told me, 'Make up your own mind; do what you want to do; it's your life.' They were very modern about that."

The budding young thespian, who had turned twenty-one on May 31, decided that Broadway couldn't get along without him much longer. He armed himself with some letters of introductions, and set out.

He wasn't afraid of New York. "I didn't have enough sense to be afraid," he said, with a wry grin.

HE delivered all the letters on his first day in New York, and, like most letters of introduction, they didn't do any good. He was turned away politely, instead of brusquely; that was all.

On his third day of job-hunting, he met another young actor on the street. They struck up an acquaintanceship.

"He told me he was playing with Fiske O'Hara in 'Jerry for Short,' and that they were letting a player go. He suggested I put in a bid for the part. I did, got it, and had my first Broadway job three days after my arrival."

This time a total stranger had proved himself a friend.

Don thought he was on his way to uninterrupted success. But the fickle gods of fame were snickering up their sleeves.

When "Jerry for Short" closed, he played in stock in Greenwich, Conn., for two weeks. Then he won the juvenile lead in the road company of "Illegal Practice"—and wound up broke after nine weeks.

He had to borrow money to get back to New York. Between February and June, he had two weeks of work; namely, a vaudeville engagement with Texas Guinan. Came June, and he couldn't hold out any longer so he wired home for money to get back to Kenosha.

There, another friend came to his rescue.

"Bernadine Flynn, of the radio team of Vic and Sade, knew me in the stock company in Madison. She heard that I was back in Kenosha, and called me from Chicago. She wanted me to make an audition there for a radio program called 'Empire Builders.'

"If it hadn't been for her, I probably wouldn't be here today. I wouldn't have known about that audition. I wouldn't have taken it. I wouldn't have gone on the air that fall of 1930. Or ever, probably."

And he wouldn't have had the chance to go on the "First Nighter" program in the spring of 1931—the program that made him famous as a radio personality—and on which he still appears, every Friday.

In the fall of 1932, another friend played a memorable part in his life.

"This friend called up one evening and asked what I was doing. If I wasn't doing anything, I could have a date with a pretty girl from Dubuque, visiting in town. I asked who the girl was; I might know her; I had gone to school in Dubuque. 'Honore Prendergast' was the name that came over the phone. 'Let me talk to her,' I practically shouted.

"We went out together that night, and every night after that while she was in Chicago. Then she had to get back to her work. She was a dietitian in Dubuque. That was the first part of September. After that, every week-end, I covered the hundred and seventy miles to Dubuque to see her. In the last part of November, we were married. Father Sheehy came back from Washington to marry us."

A fast worker, this Don Ameche.

He forgot his old Broadway ambitions. He stayed in Chicago and concentrated on his radio programs—which gave him a bigger audience and more money, than Broadway ever could. But he didn't forget his old movie ambitions.

"I came out to Hollywood a year ago last August to make a test at M-G-M. It was bad. So bad that I didn't have any Hollywood hopes left."

Then another friend did an unsought, unexpected favor for Don.

"He knew a Hollywood agent who was visiting in Chicago, and told him that my taking a test hadn't led to anything. He introduced me to the agent, who asked if I wanted an honest opinion of the test. My answer was 'Yes.'

"When he got back to Hollywood, he looked it up, and liked parts of it—much to my surprise. A flash here and a flash there showed something, he said. He arranged another test for me, this time in New York. I flew there after a 'Grand Hotel' broadcast to make it. And all the way back to Chicago afterward, I kicked myself for having gone on another wild-goose chase.

"I never expected an offer from that test. The lighting was bad; the make-up was bad; I was bad. When 20th Century-Fox sent for me, I couldn't understand why. I didn't see the test, myself, till I got out here. Then I understood even less.

"I did a broadcast on Sunday afternoon, planed out of Chicago immediately afterward, arrived here Monday morning, had a make-up test that afternoon, and started the picture Wednesday morning."

That picture was "Sins of Man," starring Jean Hersholt. In it, Don Ameche had a dual role. No other movie beginner ever has had such a start.

He came out on a contract for just one picture, with a year's option. And he didn't send for his wife and children until the option was picked up. That was less than a month later, on March 28th or 29th.

DARRYL ZANUCK then gave him one of the roles of the year—the part of Alessandro—in the first big Technicolor romance "Ramona." A week after that finished, he was testing for "Ladies in Love." A week after courting Janet Gaynor, he was wooing Sonja Henie in the big musical, "One in a Million." Before that was completed, he was cast opposite Loretta Young in "Love Is News."

In this he plays a fiery city editor. "They've put a moustache on me and grayed my hair. I'm anxious to see how I look and what I can do, as an older man."

People meeting him for the first time are invariably surprised at how young he is. As he puts it, "My voice is much older than my age."

Unlike most newcomers to sound-stages, he had no "mike fright." Neither did he have camera fright. "Still lack of good sense, maybe. I've had my troubles loosening up in front of the camera. But that wasn't fright, it was just stiffness."

He had had the most fun, making "One in a Million." He has learned the most from "Ramona"—or, to be exact, from Director Henry King.

"I was trying too hard. He made me relax. He emphasized that the basis of a good performance is sincerity. Camera angles, appearance, nothing is so important as sincerity. Suppose I had to walk over to that table and pick up something, with the camera on the other side of the table. He would say, 'Do it as you would in real life. Forget the camera. Think as you would ordinarily think; look as you would ordinarily look.' I'm remembering that."

Don is glad that he has had radio experience. "Radio gives you a terrific insight into what people like. You learn that the purpose of entertainment is to take others' minds off themselves. That's why I don't care what I do—drama, comedy, musicals, anything—just so long as it's good entertainment."

He's convinced that the play—not Ameche—is the thing. That's typical of him.

When he received the screen offer and told his radio sponsors about it, he said, "My contract with you comes first. I'll do whatever you say." They said, "Take the offer. You can still broadcast for us. We'll pipe the programs from Hollywood."

He isn't taking his success big, isn't putting on any "great lover" act, isn't talking about himself except under pressure. He would rather talk about his two youngsters—Dominic Felix (called Donnie), aged three, and Ronald John (called Ronnie), who will be a year old on the thirtieth of December.

Skin Flaky?

WON'T TAKE MAKE-UP?

HAVEN'T you come in often from the crisp, cold air and felt your skin all dry and flaky?

Impossible to put powder on. Those little flaky bits catch your powder in horrid little clumps.

You can change all that—in no time at all. Change that flaky "feel" of your skin to a slipping touch under your fingers—with just one application! See your skin so smooth you can put make-up on with joy!

How can this be?

A dermatologist explains

It's a special kind of cream that works this quick transformation. A keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream). This is how a distinguished dermatologist explains it:

"A keratolytic cream has the ability to melt away dry, dead cells clinging to the surface of the skin. It does this the instant it touches the skin. This brings the new, young cells into view at once—smooth and soft."

That's how Pond's Vanishing Cream can smooth away skin roughnesses so quickly. Use it two ways:

Melt it Smooth ... Instantly!

For powder base— Right after cleansing, put on a film of Pond's Vanishing Cream. It gives your skin a wonderful smoothness. Powder and rouge go on softly. Stay for hours.

For overnight—To give your skin lasting softness, apply Pond's Vanishing Cream after your nightly cleansing. Leave it on. It won't smear. As you sleep, your skin gets softer.

How skin roughens. Dead, dried-out particles on top scuff loose, catch powder. You can melt them off!

8-Piece Package Pond's, Dept. 9MS-VB, Clinton, Conn. Rush 8-piece package containing special tube of Pond's Vanishing Cream, generous samples of 2 other Pond's Creams and 5 different shades of Pond's Face Powder. I enclose 10¢ for postage and packing.

The Ameches live in a rambling Spanish ranch house at Encino, ten miles out in the San Fernando Valley. They rent. The place includes seven and a half acres of orange trees. The orange blossoms, he says with a smile, ought to be conclusive to a happy married life. He is madly in love with his wife. He doesn't leave any doubt about that.

He has brought his mother and father out to California to share in the sunshine, establishing them in a little place near his own. That's the kind of son he is.

Also, he is putting his younger brothers and sisters through school. One brother is studying architecture—"and I mean studying," he says.

Don isn't building a California home immediately. "I've moved around so much that I'm superstitious about trying to take root. I'm waiting till next April, when my option comes up. I'm not strong on these loan affairs. I want to have the cash in hand when I build."

Success isn't going to the well-shaped Ameche head. He isn't building castles on hopes.

He sings a little, but "can't read music." He reads books until all hours. His favorite indoor game is poker. His favorite outdoor sports are tennis and swimming. He has been too busy to have time for golf. Horseback-riding? Some. He was never on a horse in his life until he was cast as Alessandro.

He is slender, well-tailored, just a fraction under six feet tall. His eyes are brown, with a warm glint in them. His hair is brown. But his most noticeable feature is his mouth. His smile is the warmest, friendliest in Hollywood.

And what does he think of Hollywood?

"Everybody out here has been grand to me and very helpful. I feel as if everybody is my friend."

And he isn't far wrong!

Miss Rainer Regrets

me to talk of love! Certainly, love is very important, to me more important than my career, but I do not care to make newspaper stories about it! In Europe this is all so different. There, with an actress, her life is her own.

"Here, I have a vacation. I am tired. I have just finished 'The Good Earth,' so I take an airplane East. I want to see New York. I want to go to the theatre. I want to be with my friends. But my whole trip, my little vacation, it is spoiled for me. Why? I regret that the studio tells reporters, so when my airplane lands I cannot even take notice of Clifford Odets who is standing, waiting, after coming all the way out there to Jersey just to meet me. No, I cannot even look at Odets; I don't dare because I am mobbed by the reporters, like wolves they are; so by myself I jump into a taxi and run away!

LATER, when I visited Odets, the reporters, they walked through the house. Can you imagine! Through the house!" She laughed. "But I fooled them. Do you know what I did? I hid for a whole morning. I lay flat on the floor under a divan. And the reporters, they walked by, and one, he sat down on the divan right over my head. But he did not know that!"

She giggled, then becoming serious as if a sudden thought had popped across her mind she said, "I regret that the American women spoil their men. European men treat women as if they are delicate—helpless, as if they will break. Not so American men. And it is the fault of their women, absolutely. They are too independent. No matter how important a woman may be, no matter how much money she earns she should never, never be independent. Men don't like it.

"But I talk too much. You noticed how I opened the door for you myself." Her eyes twinkled. "I regret this is Thursday, the maid's day out, or I would ask you to lunch.

"But I will ask you, anyway." And she jumped up from the couch.

When I refused to let her bother she rushed from the room with, "But I know what I can give you," and returned carrying a huge box.

"Viennese chocolates, they are marvelous." Once more she was seated on the sofa, this time with the chocolates on a table between us.

"What was I talking about?" she began. "Oh, my regrets. I regret I used to have such a different idea of pictures. In Europe I was really an actress, but really! I played 'Saint Joan' over four hundred times. I thought pictures were only for beautiful girls. Then one day I went to 'A Farewell to Arms.' After seeing Helen Hayes I realized actresses are now in pictures, and that they could do great things if given the chance. Perhaps, I thought, there would be room for me, too.

"And I came here. And I worked very hard. But I regret they have no feeling for personal art. It is heartbreaking to develop a part and have it go into the hands of strangers when you can do nothing about it. This is not acting! This Hollywood picture business is like a factory or a big machine. My part that I work on so hard is sent through the cutting-room, like a loaf of bread. Those cutters!" Here Miss Rainer fairly moaned. "Did you know they wanted to cut the telephone scene from 'The Great Ziegfeld?'

"They have no understanding, none whatsoever. Naturally, in 'The Good Earth' I did not try to look pretty. I did not even use make-up. I worried about the starvation scenes because I was afraid I would look too healthy. So I found a dentist who knew how to make my teeth appear rotten and black. I was very excited over this wonderful discovery, but the producers, they say, 'No! That is going too far.'

"And because I look ugly in 'The Good Earth' they now tell me my next picture should be sexy." She shrugged her shoulders. "So I will be sexy.

"I was fortunate the first evening I was here. I met Garbo, Norma Shearer and Helen Hayes. After that I was not so fortunate.

"I regret the attitude of your celebrity-hunters. In Vienna the public has a warm feeling for its entertainers, but here . . . two hundred Rainer autographs equals one of Hauptmann. That's all they care about . . . headliners . . . not what a person puts into work. So I don't go to openings anymore. I cannot stand their coldness.

"As for buying clothes! In Hollywood they make such a competitive business of it that they take away the art. Back home I go look for material, for to me everything that counts in a dress is the material. Then I find a little dressmaker, and she pins the material on me so the dress becomes an individual thing. But here, I walk into a shop, they show me a dress, and they say Constance Bennett just bought it! Again it is all impersonal, a matter of sales. No one cares about your individuality.

"A few weeks ago I was in San Francisco. I passed an antique shop, there, in the window, I saw a piece of material which I loved. For a moment I thought I was home. I said I must have a dress made of that material, and I went into the shop. I asked where they bought the sample. They did not know. They sent for the manager. He said it came from Paris. And I said I must have it. So they ordered it for me. Then, when it came back to Hollywood, I found a little dressmaker, and it all makes me very happy. For once, in America, I shall wear a dress that is mine alone. No shop can tell me some one else has it!"

I glanced at my watch for I realized I had stayed too long.

"Must you go?" she asked.

"Yes. I leave tomorrow—for the East."

"You mean New York?" Her eyes gleamed with quickened interest and excitement.

"Yes, New York."

"Then, will you do me a favor? Will you deliver a message to a very good friend of mine? Will you tell him that you just saw me and I am well and hope he is the same?

"Here, I will write his name in your notebook, and his number. And you will not say his name to anyone, will you?" She gave me a worried, questioning look.

"I will not tell his name," I promised solemnly.

Excitedly she scribbled a well-known name and a private telephone number down in my book.

I duly delivered the message. And I hope that that is one action Miss Rainer will not regret.

When He's Wrong, He's Right!

Not being prepared to do any particular work, he did everything and anything that came to hand during the next year or so. His brief experience in school theatricals had driven all desire to write poetry out of his mind and he had definitely decided to be an actor. His family held out against that.

"Anything would be better than becoming an actor, they thought, and my father got me a job as a piano salesman, thinking it would stimulate my interest in music," Douglas told me with a twinkle in his eyes.

"I wasn't very successful at that job because I was always hanging around the theatre or attending a movie. My salary was $50 a week and I also had an expense account, which was just grand and gave me an opportunity to see all the good shows."

Finally, his sense of honesty came to the fore and he resigned, telling his employer that it really wasn't fair to take the money. His next job was in the wrapping department of a big music publisher and there he worked for a small salary until one day a girl friend came to town and he invited her out to lunch.

"We were living in Chicago at the time," he recounted, "and this girl had just arrived from another town where we had lived. I invited her to the most expensive speakeasy in Chicago for lunch. We sat at the bar and drank cocktails until my lunch hour was over and then, reinforced by the liquor, I telephoned my boss and told him I hadn't finished lunch. I suggested that I would be about an hour late, but he countered with the suggestion that I need not return at all."

From then on his experiences were varied. He read gas meters for a while and that job really appealed to him, he met so many pretty housemaids on his rounds of the basements. He worked in a dry goods store. He did everything under the sun but, he insists, "each different job was adding to my store of experience.

"Then one night at a party when I was, as usual, telling all who would listen what a good actor I was, a man reacted to my ambition and offered to teach me. It turned out that he was William Owen and he had a dramatic school. I went to live with him, acting as his secretary to pay for my lessons. I worked in the mens' hat department of Marshall Field half a day, which job paid me $18 a week. I held this job and continued my lessons for a year and a half. We put on shows in a half-amateur, half-professional way and then, to help his pupils, Mr. Owen took us on the road. We performed in different Shakespearean plays in small towns throughout the Middle West."

Then came an opportunity to organize a stock company of his own in Madison, Wisconsin, which he did and the venture turned out to be very successful. Toward the end of the season, our hero had managed to save $1,000. He had been producing, directing and acting in his own plays and perhaps had grown a bit tired. At any rate, as he was returning to the theatre from lunch one day he passed a travel bureau.

"The maps in the window looked interesting," he told me, "and I wandered aimlessly in and began talking with one of the agents. Certainly I had no intention of taking a trip, but before I left the place I had a round trip ticket to Europe in my pocket and my $1,000 had dwindled considerably.

"I went on to the theatre and told the company we would close in two weeks. Now, that would have seemed to be a great mistake. We were doing very well and were good for a couple of months longer in Madison, but that thousand dollars was burning holes in my pocket and I left two weeks later for Europe and the best time I've ever had in my life.

"I saw everything," he continued. "In France I rented a bicycle and, with another chap, rode all over that country. I had a grand time and didn't start home until my money was nearly gone and I arrived in New York with $65 in my pocket.

"For six weeks I lived on that sixty-five dollars. I couldn't seem to get any kind of a job. I was just about out of money when I was hired to run an elevator, starting the following day. That very day I read that Jessie Bonstelle had arrived in New York and was interviewing actors in search of a leading man. I went to the agent's office where I knew she would be and asked for her. I was told she was not in. I went outside and started down the hall. Then I stood there and asked myself: 'Am I going to let them tell me she isn't in when I know she is? Am I going to accept that kind of treatment?'

"I turned around, re-entered the office and, without a glance at the officious office girl who had refused to let me in before, sailed into the inner office where, as I had suspected, Miss Bonstelle was seeing people. I forced myself on her and she gave me an interview. She hired me for the second lead in her show. The next season I was her leading man.

"It might have been a mistake for me to break into her office that way. I might have been on that manager's black list the rest of my life for my freshness, but I wasn't."

HIS career went along then as many careers do. There were ups and downs, but mostly ups. Finally he was under contract to David Belasco, who was producing "Tonight or Never" with Helen Gahagan as the star.

"It will be impossible to do this play unless I have the right leading man," she told the producer. To which he replied that he had just the actor for the part and proceeded to dig up photographs of Melvyn Douglas to show her. One look at the picture and Miss Gahagan was positive he wouldn't do, but Belasco prevailed upon her to see him.

"I was so nervous when I met her for the interview," Mr. Douglas told me, "that to cover up my inferiority complex I put on a bold front that was very foreign to me. I did everything wrong. If I ever made mistakes, I made them that day. I smoked cigarette after cigarette, which was the greatest affront to any singer and particularly Miss Gahagan, who had just arrived from Europe where they have enough respect for a voice to refrain from smoking in the same room. I succeeded in making a boor of myself in my efforts to appear at ease. Before I left she had decided to give me the part. And that was the beginning of our romance, which we don't consider a mistake," he laughed.

Their marriage has been one of the happy ones in the theatrical world. They have even worked together in many plays, which most people of the stage think is a fatal mistake. On several occasions, when he was appearing in another show, he has directed her in her plays. Strangely enough, she likes having her husband direct her, and some day they hope to appear in a picture together.

Eventually their paths led to Hollywood where both had picture contracts. He was under contract to Goldwyn, but Goldwyn had nothing for him at the time and lent him to other producers. Being loaned here and there irked Douglas a little, and he didn't like some of his roles too well, so he asked Goldwyn for a release from his contract. He talked it over with his wife and they agreed it was the best thing to do, so he spent as much energy in talking himself out of his contract as most actors do in trying to get a job, and succeeded in getting his release. All his friends were of the opinion that it was a big mistake, but having secured his freedom he left immediately, with his wife, for a trip around the world. On his return he did a play in New York and then had another season in Hollywood.

"But it seemed I hadn't gotten into my stride in pictures," he resumed, "and after a few months here I said 'to hell with it' and returned to New York. More plays and the opportunity to direct Lillian Gish in 'Within the Gates,' which I enjoyed very much."

BUT always he was brought back to Hollywood. Next came "She Married Her Boss" with Claudette Colbert, which stamped him indelibly upon the consciousness of both producers and fans—it won him a contract with Columbia. Now Columbia is learning all about the game of hide and seek for, although he is in constant demand for more pictures, he regularly runs away to New York to appear in a play.

"Everyone said it was a mistake when Helen signed a contract and went East recently to do a play," he continued. "At that time I expected to be here all winter and our friends said it was a mistake to deliberately bring about such a long separation. But now I've signed a contract to do one of the best plays I've read in years and I'm going to New York in a month to start rehearsals. We'll be together after all, when it seemed impossible a month ago."

When he was engaged for the romantic lead opposite Joan Crawford in "The Gorgeous Hussy," everyone advised him not to do it.

"With Bob Taylor, M-G-M's pride and pet in the picture!" they said, aghast. "And Joan's husband, Franchot Tone, in the same picture! What chance will you have? Don't do it. It's murder!" they raved.

But Melvyn liked the part and took it. After he had worked a few days on the picture his part was rewritten and made more important. When the picture was finished it was the verdict of many critics that he had walked off with all the honors. As a reward for doing that good job he was next co-starred with Irene Dunne in "Theodora Goes Wild," in which he showed his versatility in a delightfully humorous role. He has just finished "Women of Glamor" with Virginia Bruce, and if you are fortunate enough to be in New York this season, you may see him in that play he is going to do.

"No, really," he concluded, "there's no such thing as a mistake if you don't allow your actions to be mistakes. But remember, there's always luck to be considered. It doesn't pay to accept advice, no matter how kindly and wisely it is given, because it doesn't always turn out to be good advice."

There is one time, however, that Melvyn admits he made a great mistake, but he argues that inasmuch as he knew it was a mistake before he made it, it shouldn't count against his perfect record.

He and Mrs. Douglas were on a trip around the world and as they were about to leave Rome for a trek into the desert she decided to stock up on a certain kind of candy, of which she was very fond.

"We won't be able to get it anywhere else," she insisted, "and, in fact, we won't be able to get any decent candy at all where we are going."

That settled it and although Melvyn did, surreptitiously, dispose of several pounds of it before they left, they took along enough to attract a particularly large and vicious type of ant. Before they had an opportunity to open the candy the ants had discovered it. Those busy little creatures had called a field day. They had taken possession of not only the candy, but also all the Douglas' wardrobe, where they had lived and loved and multiplied by the thousands.

"Now, that is what I call a mistake," laughed Mr. Douglas, "but you see I was on a holiday so it doesn't count."

Fastest Gal in Town

started on Eleanore's first celluloider, "Millions in the Air." In this she was doing a tap number on top of a piano. But what you didn't see was her clog catching and the resultant crash as she hit the keyboard, then landed on the floor with one ankle twisted under her.

"In those days," she explained, "I thought the show must go on, so I had my ankle taped up and took to the piano top again. As a result of my heroics I'll always have one ankle larger than the other. Now," and she nodded her red head for emphasis, "I've learned to let the show go on—but without me. I still haven't learned, though, how to keep on my feet!" she added sadly.

IN 'Three Cheers for Love' I was paralyzed for five days after doing a trambolene number on some chairs—you know, hopping from one chair to another. There were six chairs, but I missed the last one. That time I snapped a ligament in my back. Then in 'Rose Bowl' I was supposed to take a fall in a scene with Buster Crabbe. When the director suggested a double I got pretty indignant. That was my special line, after all. Well, there were nine takes but none looked realistic. The tenth was so realistic that I snapped my hip out and came to an hour later. And in the picture I'm working in now, 'College Holiday'—that is, if you're still with me," she grinned—"Johnny Downs and I do a dance on the platform of a train. There was some grease on the ground. Everybody else stepped in it. But I slipped in it." And she pointed under the table to a bandaged ankle as proof.

"That brings my casualties up to date, anyhow."

Wasn't this the first picture in which she had appeared with Johnny Downs, we asked.

Eleanore brightened immediately. "Now," she said, "you're on my favorite subject. Yes, it's our first picture together. The studio decided we'd make such a cute couple—and here Johnny and I had decided that six months ago! But," she shook her head earnestly, "we aren't in love. It's just a case of having so much fun together."

It may not be love, but none of the symptoms are missing. What's more Johnny and Eleanore have never been seen in anyone else's company since the day they met. And that brings up the case of Robert Taylor. Eleanore was making a personal appearance at a Los Angeles theatre when Bob and his manager came backstage to be introduced. That night Bob took Eleanore, plus two white orchids, to the Cocoanut Grove. And he made a date then and there for the next Saturday night, claiming that Eleanore was absolutely the best dancer he'd ever met. But—that was the fatal week when Eleanore met Johnny.

"You see, Johnny's the most un-Hollywood person I've ever met," she went on. "We can have the most wonderful times doing the silliest things. Like when we're driving along, and at a stop sign Johnny will lean out to the next car and yell, 'This is Eleanore Whitney with me. What? You've never heard of her! Why, the idea! She's the girl who does sixty taps in four seconds!'

"The other day," and Eleanore's laugh bubbled over in the irresistible way it has of doing, "when we were on location at the Union Pacific depot, I decided to get even with Johnny for all his teasing. I gave the porter fifty cents to help me out. You should have seen Johnny—he turned positively vermillion under his make-up when that porter came hollering through the depot, 'Paging Johnny Downs, the First Baby!'

"We have so much fun," she said, "but according to Hollywood standards we're pretty dull. We don't smoke or drink or go to the Trocadero. We go to the movies and end up with a malt. You know, it's really funny," she chuckled, "what a disappointment I am to my friends back East. They've read in the papers about how I dash dizzily from one night club to another and then they come out here and find I haven't even been to the Troc!"

FURTHERMORE, the fastest girl in Hollywood hasn't had as many dates in a lifetime as the average girl her age! And that in spite of auburn curls, creamy skin and inch long eyelashes (her own, too) to say nothing of a figure combining an even five feet with an even hundred pounds. It isn't, as you may have guessed, because Eleanore hasn't had the chance. She hasn't had the time. When you start out at ten to be a career gal you can bet that the "dates" for the next eight years will be chiefly with dancing teachers and school teachers, and any chance engagements will be limited to the theatre.

"As a matter of fact," Eleanore said, "my career started in the crib. At least my mother says I wiggled my toes even in my sleep. I know I learned to tap lots faster than I learned to talk!"

A gift for dancing had never showed up in any of the Whitneys before, so no particular attention was given to this daughter's talented toes. Not until one eventful day when Eleanore was ten years old and Bill Robinson came to town. He was appearing at the Palace Theatre in Cleveland and Mrs. Whitney took Eleanore to the performance. The little girl begged so hard to "see the wonderful man close up" that Mrs. Whitney arranged with the manager to take her backstage.

"I don't think the child lives whom Bill Robinson wouldn't smile at in the same kindly, friendly way he smiled at me that day," said Eleanore, "but it seemed so particularly for me that I forgot about being bashful and offered to do a dance for him!"

Bill Robinson sat watching the red-headed youngster for a couple of minutes while his smile broadened into a delighted grin. Suddenly he was beside her, his famous feet falling into step with her inexperienced ones. The visit ended up with Mr. Robinson teaching her a routine which he said no white person had ever been able to master.

"Yes, little girl, I'll teach you what I know about dancing," Bill Robinson had said. And every time he came to Cleveland he gave Eleanore a lesson. Then one day, several months later, Mrs. Whitney received a wire. If she would bring Eleanore to New York, Bill Robinson would give her a lesson every day for the two months of his stay.

And so the lessons started—fifteen minutes the first day, then twenty, then half hour lessons until the patient teacher had the child trained to dancing for hours without becoming tired out.

"Bill Robinson has the biggest, whitest heart in the world. Do you know that he has never taken one penny for all the time and patience he has spent on me?

If you are grateful, that's all Bill Robinson wants. When I was a guest on Bing Crosby's radio program a while ago I happened to mention how much my first teacher had helped me. I didn't say much—but I meant it. And a wire came from him before the program was half over. He thanked me and said that ten thousand dollars could never have repaid him for those words."

AGAIN a smile crinkled up the corners of her eyes and she burst into laughter. "Bill Robinson said the funniest thing that ever happened to one of his dances was in 'The Big Broadcast.' You see, when he heard that I was going to be put in the picture at the last minute, he helped me with a routine for it. Oh—that's just Bill Robinson," Eleanore added in explanation. "Well, we worked hard on that number—awfully hard. And when the picture was released, Bill said he didn't even see the dance. He blinked once and missed my whole appearance on the screen!"

When the two months' New York training was up, Eleanore and her mother returned to Cleveland. But it wasn't "out of sight, out of mind" for Bill Robinson. At his instigation, Rae Samuels, "The Blue Streak of Vaudeville," called Eleanore to the theatre for an audition the first time she came through Cleveland.

"I danced for Miss Samuels in the bathroom, of all places," Eleanore continued. "It was the only tile floor backstage. When I finished she said, 'How would you like to come along with me?' Well, I was twelve then, and the only Santa Claus I believed in was Bill Robinson. So you can imagine how I felt when a wire came from her two weeks later telling me to join her at once in Youngstown, Ohio."

This time Mrs. Whitney didn't go along, because she had another daughter, three years younger than Eleanore, to take care of at home. So small Eleanore Whitney set out alone to make her mark in the world.

"And I loved every minute of it—except those made miserable by the Gerry Society," she added with a grimace. "It was funny, though, at that. You see, when any of these child-labor-law addicts would start backstage, everyone would rush to disguise me. I'd get high heels, a long dress, glasses and sometimes a few grease-paint wrinkles if there was time enough. And I always tried to think of Methuselah or something more or less aged in hopes that I'd look a little older. Well, they'd take one look at me and leave, whispering that footlights and make-up were a remarkable invention. I looked so pretty and young on the stage! And that was my first dramatic training, because I never did anything but dancing then, and never dreamed about acting until Paramount signed me up a year ago."

AFTER four years with the "Blue Streak" Eleanore decided to strike out on her very own. The Roxy Theatre in New York City was her first engagement.

"If you've ever seen the Roxy you may have a vague idea of how I felt." Eleanore looked woe-begone at the thought of it. "There I was, just a little peanut out on that huge stage—alone for the first time in my life! I'd never had the slightest touch of stage-fright before. Most of the rhythm on that program, let me tell you, wasn't from my toes tapping, but my knees knocking."

When Jack Benny asked her to make personal appearances with him the next week, Eleanore jumped at the chance. On the completion of their engagement there,

THE RIGHT AND WRONG ABOUT COLDS!

Facts It Will Pay You to Know!

THE "Common Cold" is the scourge of our civilization.

Every year it takes more in lives and health and expense than any other ailment to which we're subject.

The sad part of it is that much of the misery caused by colds is due to carelessness or ignorance in treating colds.

A cold, as your doctor will tell you, is an internal infection caused by a virus or germ. In other words, regardless of the locality of the symptoms, a cold is something lodged within the system.

Everything but the Right Thing!

The failure of many people to recognize the true nature of a cold results in much mistreatment of colds. More often than not, people do everything but the right thing in the treatment of a cold

They employ externals of all kinds when it's obvious that you've got to get at a cold from the inside. They swallow all kinds of preparations which, for seven months of the year, are good for everything but colds and which suddenly become "also good for colds" when the cold weather sets in.

Many of these methods are good as far as they go—but they don't go far enough! They don't treat a cold internally and thereby get at the infection in the system. The result often is that a cold progresses to the point where "complications" set in and it becomes a serious matter.

What a Cold Calls for

It's obvious that a cold calls, first of all, for a cold treatment! A preparation that's good for all kinds of different ailments can't be equally good for colds.

A cold, furthermore, calls for internal treatment. An infection within the system must be got at from the inside.

Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine tablets supply reliable treatment.

First of all, Bromo Quinine tablets are cold tablets! They are made for colds and only colds. They are not a "cure-all" or a preparation only incidentally good for colds.

Secondly, Bromo Quinine tablets are internal treatment. They work within you and they do four important things.

Four Important Effects

They open the bowels, an acknowledgedly wise step in treating a cold.

They combat the infection in the system.

They relieve the headache and fever.

They tone the system and help fortify against further attack.

This is the fourfold effect you want for the treatment of a cold and in Bromo Quinine you get it in the form of a single tablet.

Safe as Well as Effective

Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine tablets impose no penalty for their use. They contain nothing harmful and are safe to take. Their dependability is proven by over 40 years of use.

Bromo Quinine tablets now come sugar-coated as well as plain. The sugar-coated tablets are exactly the same as the regular except that they are coated with sugar for palatability.

Every drug store in America sells Grove's Bromo Quinine tablets. Let them be your first thought in case of a cold.

Ask for, and demand, Grove's Bromo Quinine tablets! The few pennies' cost may save you a lot in worry, suspense and expense.

Jack Benny left for Hollywood, with a bet that Eleanore would be following inside of two months. Her next job was with Rudy Vallee in a Chicago theatre. It was while there that a screen test was made and Eleanore received a wire to report at Paramount Studios for work. On the last night of their appearance together, Rudy called Eleanore to the stage for a final bow, then motioned to the orchestra. They burst into "California, Here I Come."

"And I burst into tears," said Eleanore. "Hollywood was the last place I wanted to go just then."

But the next day Eleanore Whitney was on the plane bound for California. Hollywood's fastest—and nicest—girl was on her way.

Is Hollywood a Woman's Town?

or do any stunts or dress up in any funny costumes. They stayed until after four and I think that I have never had more fun at a party in Hollywood, even if this one was my own. I have never," he added, lugubriously, "given or attended another one like it!"

A woman's town? I think it was Pat O'Brien who related recently that he was having a rub-down after a strenuous game of handball. Suddenly he said to the rubber, "Hey, buddy! What's the matter? Have you gone sissy? I want a rub-down. I don't want to be patted!"

The attendant looked startled. "So sorry!" he apologized, beginning to pummel the O'Brien anatomy with real vigor. "Y'know we have more women customers than men, these days, and we've had to learn to pull our punches!"

Ronnie Colman says that Hollywood is pretty well ruled by a certain type of woman. "Most of the women here have jobs," he commented. "They can afford to meet men on their own terms and they don't have to make any special effort to please us. But the out-of-door woman—the woman who rides, swims, plays a good game of tennis—has more attention in Hollywood than she can possibly use. If she dances well, is lively and is good at the glib conversational give and take, she can have things pretty much her own way, so far as the local male contingent is concerned.

"But I observed recently that a beautiful visitor in our midst—a helpless, frilly, sleep-until-noon girl, lovely to look at, expensively dressed and fragile—had a very thin time of it. She left us abruptly in a state of fretful discontent. No one was very sorry.

"Look," he said, suddenly, with an amused sort of bitterness. "Look at what they—the women—have done to places like Malibu and Palm Springs. A man's idea of a perfect beach shack is a house with sand-proof floors, water-proof upholstering—made of leather or canvas or something. What do you think happens now if you drop a wet bathing suit on one of the pastel, glazed chintz chairs which embellish the houses at Malibu? I have," he was suddenly smug and secretive, "I have a place in the desert . . . now!"

HE went on, "If anyone should ask me whether I should like to sit, in a dinner coat, playing some ridiculous game, I should say that I would certainly NOT like to do any such thing. And yet I find myself doing it and enjoying it. You see, they make us like it. And that, I suppose, is the real test of whether or not Hollywood is a woman's town. They make us like it!" He shook his head and looked puzzled. But I was convinced that he really did like it.

Clark Gable wrinkled his famous nose and squirmed a bit when I tackled him on this moot question. "Please don't make me sound like a disappointed cynic or something," he urged. "But in all truth the thing does boil itself down to a matter of money—salaries. Feminine glamor, appeal, whatever you choose to call it, is worth more at the box office than anything a man can offer. Nearly all of the well-known women in Hollywood earn more money, per week, than the men do. Maybe, in your home town, or mine, the banker's son is considered the real 'catch'. His attractiveness is not actually measured, perhaps, by what he can do for a woman. But that ability to 'do' certainly comes into her appraisal of him! In a town where the women, as a rule, earn more money than the men do, things get all topsy-turvy. These women have hundreds of admirers who are outside the industry, chaps who don't have to spend as much time and effort on their jobs as we do, chaps who haven't any jobs at all and who can spend their time perfecting their polo, developing their bodies, traveling, acquiring sophistication and whatever mental attributes attract women.

"Did you ever," he added, with some heat, "encounter an actor at the end of a hard day's work? Unless he is a sort of superman, he is fit company for almost no one. And it is so difficult to synchronize your leisure hours with those of the woman who interests you . . ."

I didn't bring it up but I did think, at this point in the conversation, of a remark made by a leading man who was under contract to M-G-M. "It's a woman's lot!" he said. "If a man gets himself a big following at the box-office, what is his reward? He is allowed to support one of the important women stars!"

I was feeling distinctly depleted with it all when I finally collared Gene Raymond and asked him his opinion. "Is Hollywood," I murmured, "a woman's town?"

WELL, Gene surprised me some. "It certainly is." he opined, briskly. "Almost every man in Hollywood who has had a really successful career owes it to some woman. Sometimes it is a wife. Sometimes a sweetheart. Often it is some experienced, older woman who interests herself in him and from some maternal instinct undertakes to guide him. Maybe the glamor girls get all the admiration, the bouquets and the notices from the press. But when you see a successful man in Hollywood, keep in mind that probably some woman is almost wholly responsible for that success! I could name dozens!"

Is Hollywood a woman's town? I've collected what evidence I could from the gentlemen. Maybe, some day I'll muster up strength enough to ask the girls what they think!

The Fox picture titled, "Up the River," was his initial cinematic offering. Astrology fans will tell you that Spencer, born April 5, 1900, is an Aries man. And Aries means a ram. The hometown is Milwaukee. Spencer is five feet ten and one-half inches, sturdily built, has blue eyes and a shock of uncontrollable brown hair. He is married to Louise Treadwell, non-professional, and has a son and daughter. His next picture will be "The Foundry," with Jean Harlow.

SALLY JANE BARTLETT, Winnetka, Illinois—The explanation for the absolute secrecy surrounding Harpo Marx's marriage isn't hard to find. Prankophobia (fear of pranks, to you) is the answer. At Chico's marriage, his two brothers amused the guests by eating all the leaves off the family's rubber plant. The clergyman walked out. And when Groucho married, Harpo played possum under a rug. Oh yes, Chico and Groucho were laying for Harpo, all right.

ROBERT YOUNG (Last printed November 1935. Total number of requests since then 243.) Never was there so righteous, so self-possessed a Dr. Jekyl as the off-screen Robert Young, or such a rampaging, scampering, egotistical Mr. Hyde as the Young you and I adore on the screen. Quietly married to the "Sweet Adeline" of his high-school days, daddy to pretty little Carol Anne, taking the problems of parenthood as seriously as a daddy with his first child does, this is the private life portrait of Bob Young. Tinging this domestic bliss is a wee shade of melancholy springing from an inferiority complex that all Bob's success has not eradicated. A "putter-offer" is what he calls himself, and he'll tell you whimsical stories about himself to prove the point. He's ambitious, too, or is "ambitious" out of place applied to a chap who's already arrived? Bob'll tell you he hasn't arrived by any manner of means . . . he wants to be a great actor some day. His life story starts in Chicago where he was born February 22, 1907, son of a well-to-do building contractor. Educated in Seattle and Los Angeles, his dramatic tendencies came to light in high-school club work. His diploma won, Bob started knocking about for a profession. He tried his hand at everything but the stage . . . clerk in a drug store, reporter, building and loan association salesman, bank clerk. Meanwhile, nights, he was playing everything from Hamlet to Little Caesar in Pasadena's amateur "little theatre." Eventually his work was noticed, and, to his surprise, Bob became neither a druggist nor a bank president . . . but an actor . . . cast opposite Helen Hayes in "The Sin of Madelon Claudet." Bob is just six feet tall, with sympathetic brown eyes and brown hair which he parts in the middle. His next picture is "Stowaway" . . . the latest Shirley Temple vehicle.

ANNA JUHASZ, Tulsa, Oklahoma—They tell a cute yarn about dashing young Tyrone Power. In days gone by, Tyrone didn't use to be as wealthy as he is today. Invited to a formal party, he had just funds enough to rent himself a white tie and all that goes with it. Without a nickel in his formal pockets, he started up Broadway. When the borrowed shoes began to pinch, he slipped them off and finished the march in his silk sox.

JOAN CRAWFORD (Last printed June, 1936. Total number of requests since then 189.) To change a habit, a single habit is an act of will beyond the capacity of most of us mortals. To revolutionize a personality, plumbing its very foundations . . . who has the moral fibre, the courage to perform that dangerous operation on himself? Yet that is just what intrepid Joan Crawford has done. Above all others, above Clara Bow, above Colleen Moore, Joan Crawford was the symbol of the crazed post-war jazz age. She it was who copped all the Charleston prizes, the tango prizes, who starred in "Our Dancing Daughters," "Our Modern Maidens," who worked all day and went to parties at night. But time marched on, and with a last weary saxophone bleat, the jazz age passed away. Carried along in the wake of its passage were legions of its exponents . . . unfortunates who had been unable to adjust themselves to changing ways. Among the few who stood prepared to answer the call of the new era was Joan. Compare the modern maiden of ten years ago with the sophisticated lady of today. Today she is married to one of the screen's most polished gentlemen. Together they study voice, together they have amassed one of the finest libraries of classical music in Hollywood, together they produce high-brow plays in their private theatre. Joan was born in San Antonio, Texas, March 23rd, 1908, and baptized Lucille Le Sueur Cassin. She was just a baby when the family moved to Kansas City where Billie Cassin, as the gang called her, was educated. Father Cassin owned a theatre but wouldn't hear of Billie having anything to do with the stage . . . which meant that Joan had to pursue the stage career she dreamed of, in spite of Cassin senior, rather than with his help. Joan's dancing feet won her her initial stage job, but she soon moved into the purely dramatic field. In the late '20's, her stage name, Lucille Le Sueur, was exchanged for the more pronounceable, more spellable Joan Crawford of today. Her 1931 marriage to Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. lasted two years. And two years after the divorce, she wed Doug's old friend, Franchot Tone. Joan is 5 feet 4 inches tall, with brown hair and blue eyes. The next picture on her schedule is "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney," opposite Robert Montgomery.

MARCIA PETERS, Akron, Ohio—Is Clark Gable still popular? Well, last time he was in New York, a gang of female fans, spying him in a cab, ordered Mr. Gable out. Clark, shy young chap, demurred. Whereupon the enraged maidens started to overturn the cab. Gable, capitulating, stepped out of the swaying vehicle and let the girls gaze at the face that had come so near launching a taxi cab. Oh yes, Clark Gable is still popular!

BILLY LATZO, Athens, Georgia—The tallest star in pictures is not Gary Cooper by a long shot. Of all people, it's Arthur Treacher, the screen's butler of butlers, who measures six feet four and one half inches from stem to stern. And, speaking of size, you might be interested to know that Lily Pons takes the cake for daintiness, wearing a 1½B shoe. Lucky that Arthur isn't in Lily's shoes.

COLONEL TIM McCOY (Last printing, November 1934, Total number of requests since then, 368.) No Kentucky Colonel is Tim McCoy. But, while his rank in the movies has had nothing to do with his rank in the army, the epaulettes had plenty to do with his screen success. When production began on "The Covered Wagon," way back in the old silent days, the problem came up . . . "How do we corral five hundred savage Injuns and transform them into movie actors?" Answer to the director's prayer was McCoy, at that time cavalry captain in charge of Wyoming's Indian reservations. Nee-hee Cha-uth (High Eagle) his Indian brothers called him, and he was the only pale-face East or West of the Rockies who could order a hamburger in Indian sign lingo. So the handsome army officer became official Indian rounder-upper. But a very simple equation, fermented in the minds of Columbia executives, changed the face of things. McCoy's the McCoy. Here was the virtuoso of the West . . . the genuine article . . . wasting his time as a rounder-upper. Soldier Tim declared an armistice with the red-skins, and for thirteen years has been standing at attention before batteries of cameras. The vital statistics read like this . . . Timothy John Fitzgerald McCoy is the full name . . . the bearer was born the tenth of April, somewhere along in the early '90's . . . Saginaw, Michigan was the birthplace, and in those wild and woolly days was a lot farther West than today . . . Tim is 5 feet 11 inches without his boots, 170 pounds of bone and muscle, has blue eyes and blonde hair . . . in private life he is rancher McCoy, proprietor of a 15,000 acre ranch . . . divorced from wife Agnes Heron Miller, mother of his son and daughter . . . one of the world's fastest trigger men . . . can yank the ole six shooter from its holster, fan the hammer, and put six slugs into a target, all in two thirds of one second. The Colonel's most recent release is "Bulldog Courage."

SHEILA McCORMACK, Oakland, California —Your question about insurance brings to mind two astonishing cases of out of the way policies. Marlene Dietrich's legs are insured for one million dollars. Gertrude Niesen's back, of all things, is covered by a fifty thousand buck policy. Wonder how they estimated that Marlene's legs were worth twenty times as much as G.N.'s back?

She Won't Play Hunches

a lower berth ticket, I would be able to buy myself another dress, which I certainly would be able to use. The idea was agreeable to all."

As it happened, Gertrude at that time had rather unfounded notions about Hollywood.

"I thought everybody dressed in light, airy things," she laughed ruefully, "like crinolines and taffetas. Heaven knows where I got the idea from, but I got it. So I took the $98 rebate on my compartment ticket and bought a dress that was the last word to me but wasn't even a first word in Hollywood! It was such a shame, too, for I was so elated over that new dress. I kept it in a separate box until I got to Hollywood. I wore it just once!"

That was Gertrude's first Hollywood error. Her second followed without much delay. Being the type of person who feels it is right to work for a salary, Gertrude had quaint ideas about working when she arrived on the Coast. She took her screen test and was signed to a contract. No one mentioned work to her, but Gertrude took it for granted she was meant to be around the premises daily—just in case.

The premises of the lot are enormous. They ramble fore and aft for miles. Gertrude, undaunted, arrived every morning at nine o'clock. Not knowing just what to do about her arrival, she sought company and company, of course, was on the various sets and stages where pictures were being made. The directors began to know Gertrude. The supervisors began to know her. The writers and the players began to know her. Day after day, Gertrude appeared at the studio at nine o'clock, lunched in the studio restaurant at noon and departed for home at five o'clock.

Then came the discovery that maybe she was being a little enthusiastic about things. The discovery happened in the studio restaurant. The hour was noon. Entering the restaurant, Gertrude passed a table where several directors were sitting. As she approached the table, she couldn't help hearing one of them describe a certain type actress he was trying to find—with no success thus far.

"The description he was giving was of me," Gertrude recounted. "He described me perfectly. As I came alongside the table, he stopped in his description to call out to me:

"'Hello, Gertrude.'

"Then he went right on describing me as this actress type he needed and was having such a hard time finding."

"Why didn't you walk up to him and ask him for the job?" we put in.

"I couldn't do that," Gertrude was aghast at the thought. "But it began to dawn on me then that perhaps it wasn't just the thing to do to appear at the studio every day unless I was especially called to be there.

"I stayed home after that," she continued. "I had things to do anyway."

Keeping up her music was one of these things. Not only did Gertrude give piano recitals before she was twelve years old, but she studied at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music when she graduated from high school, becoming a real artist.

"SPEAKING of my music," she remarked, "I've made up my mind to one thing since being in New York this trip, and I can say this to you with exactly the same certainty that I can say I'll die someday. In five years time I am going to be the solo artiste with either the New York Philharmonic Orchestra or Stowkowski's Philadelphia Orchestra and I am going to play Tschaikowsky's Concerto Number I. I've made up my mind to achieve that."

Be surprised if she doesn't achieve it, not if she does. Gertrude takes her time in coming to decisions, but once she reaches them—well, she's a bulldog for hanging on to them.

For instance, after being with M-G-M for little over three months and during that time playing in only one picture, Gertrude asked for and got her release. She went in for freelancing and tasted starvedom—not stardom.

"It wasn't at all gay for a while," she admitted.

Then things began to brighten. One picture led to another and the final one to a Paramount contract.

"I've played about every kind of role except myself," she recollected.

Some she enjoyed, some she grimaced over. Only two did she suffer real heart twinges over. One occurred when Frank Capra tried to borrow her from Paramount to play the lead in his production, "Lost Horizon," with Ronald Colman and an all-star cast. Paramount refused to loan her and Gertrude could have wept. Maybe she did, a little. And who could blame her?

Paramount, however, couldn't see their way clear to loaning her at the time. They saw their way a little later, though, and loaned her to another studio for a picture that, when she read it in script form, didn't believe was seriously intended for production. But it was. Gertrude protested to Paramount against making the film. Paramount said they had given their word she would make it. Gertrude, who understands loyalty—though not always its devious motives—did the picture. Soon after that, she asked for her release and was free-lancing again. She preferred it that way. Then RKO-Radio flirted a contract beneath her small nose and after considering it she finally put her signature on the dotted line.

She's an easy-going young woman, Gertrude Michael. That is, she's easy going until she reaches a decision to be anything else. Having been born and reared in the South, Gertrude is a true reflection of old Dixie. A trace of a southern accent lingers in her voice. She has a special study fitted up at her home in Toluca Lake that is lined with books.

She's no "blue-stocking." She simply is hospitable and gracious in answering questions. Because of this trait, she may unwittingly convey the impression that she's an easy mark. But she isn't. She sometimes yields a point to avoid being teased and then, as it works out, she learns something of significance to herself.

Gertrude tells the story about the day in Hollywood when Isabel Jewell came to see her. Isabel was feeling "low" and decided she had ailments, so the best thing to do was to go see a doctor and learn the "happy worse." There is a medical center in Los Angeles where patients may go for a complete diagnosis. Isabel wanted to go there.

"You come with me," she invited Gertrude.

Gertrude refused. "There's nothing wrong with me."

"But I want to go and I won't go alone," Isabel complained.

The long and short of it was that Gertrude went along with her even though reluctant to do so.

"WE were X-rayed and had everything done to us that goes with a general examination," Gertrude recalled. "Then, after an hour or so of this, we were ushered into the reception-room to await the verdict. I was bored to death by this time and tired as the dickens. Isabel stood by the window, awaiting the dire news. After a short wait, a doctor came out, looked around, espied Isabel and me.

" 'You,' and he waved a dismissing hand at Isabel, 'there's nothing the matter with you. But you,' and he swung around on me, shaking his finger at me, 'young woman, you have—', and he went into a long rigamorole of what I had. Isabel was dismissed with a clean slate. But I," Gertrude laughed, "I was told to come back the next day!"

She didn't though, and there was where Gertrude made another mistake. It was no fluke of chance that she accompanied Isabel Jewell to that medical center. Gertrude, herself, had the "hunch" that she should listen to that doctor, but she didn't. And because she didn't, and likewise because she kept going at a terrific speed, she lost something she intensely wanted—the chance to make a picture in England this fall. On the eve of sailing for London to star in a talkie called "The Dominant Sex," Gertrude contracted a cold and because she had ignored previous warnings, the cold became disturbingly complicated and landed her in Doctors' Hospital for the six weeks she would have spent in England, starring in that talkie.

"And I was looking forward so eagerly to the trip and the picture," she sighed.

"Maybe next time you'll listen to the warning when you get it," we comforted.

"I hope so," and Gertrude sighed again.

She's a curious combination, this Gertrude Michael. She has the "up" or the "down" temperament; hitting the even keel between the two is something she hasn't quite caught onto yet. She has been the "man" of her little family since her father passed away some years ago. His passing induced her to give up a five-year scholarship she won, while at the University of Alabama, to study in Italy.

Instead, with the aid of those who understood how to handle the business details of the idea, she founded Radio Station WFDA at her home town, Talladega, Alabama and was pretty much the whole station, acting, playing the piano, arranging all the programs. A year of this and she returned to the stage, to the Stuart Walker Stock Company and then on to New York's Broadway. Pictures finally routed her out of the theatre dressing-room to the motion picture dressing-room. But, she said, "I am going to do a play next year."

"Have you got one picked out?"

She nodded. "Yes."

Gertrude lives alone in her house at Toluca Lake. She knows many people. She likes many people. She, in turn, is very popular. For a number of years, her almost constant escort was Rouben Mamoulian, the director. Of Armenian heritage, moody, artistic, Mamoulian would appeal to the gay yet unhappy little southern girl from Talladega, Alabama. There was talk of Gertrude's engagement to Mamoulian. But there is no engagement, and as for marriage, Gertrude neither says she will nor won't marry.

She wants to be a "somebody" in motion pictures and in the theatre, too. One picture will give her the particular opportunity she knows will come. She has made an enviable place for herself in pictures, but she still feels she has yet to get the "break" that she yearns for.

Between You 'n' Me

but that I know is impossible. I have nothing more to say, but in closing I shall look forward to the fact that "There's Always Tomorrow" in expecting to see you starred in another picture. Yours truly, "Camille." —Ann Miranda, Brooklyn, N. Y.

High and Mighty Stars

I wonder if the movie stars ever stop to think how high and mighty they often become once they are "in the money." Many of these people worked hard once upon a time in the chorus or at other jobs. It is quite annoying to read in the papers and magazines how this star or that one has either walked out or is having trouble with his studio. They claim they are overworked, not getting enough money, or refuse to work in a picture with someone they don't get along with. These people get more money than many men who are heads of large organizations and who have

Casting the best-seller, "Gone with the Wind"

How much of the greatness of "Gone with the Wind" will be lost if it is not properly cast! The subtleties of this story, to me, seem more important than the actual facts, and must be brought out to the full, or it will be just another Civil War picture. The actors and actresses who would recognize this would be:

Margaret Sullavan as Scarlett; Clark Gable as Rhett Butler; Loretta Young as Melanie; Randolph Scott as Ashley Wilkes; Merle Oberon as Ellen; William Frawley as Gerald; Spring Byington as Aunt Pittypat; Bill Robinson as Uncle Peter; Stepin Fetchit as Pork; Shirley Temple as Bonny.—Lee Brown, East Orange, N. J.

"Bits" from Letters

Robert Taylor could almost be named Robert Trailer, for in the list of forthcoming pictures he's listed four times in six.—C. C., Vancouver, Canada. . . . You can have your Gables, Taylors and MacMurrays, but I'll take Don Ameche.—M. Doehl, Poughkeepsie, N. Y. . . . Why not cast Shirley Temple and Freddie Bartholomew in a picture together?—Elizabeth Graves, Nashville, Tenn. My pet peeve is the "still" displayed in theatre lobbies that bears little or no relation to the picture it is supposed to be from.—Anna Johnson, Youngstown, Ohio. Gene Autry is God's gift to Western pictures. I was just about ready to fire Westerns from my staff, when Gene and his grand personality loomed upon the gray horizon.—J. Myers, Kansas City, Mo. Of the 270 pictures rated in MODERN SCREEN's Movie Scoreboard, only 79 are classed as good or better; 144 are rated as fair or poor, with 47 receiving a 2½ star rating, being neither good enough to receive 3 stars and a little better than fair. Can something be done to improve the quality of pictures?—B. Douthit, Okmulgee, Oklahoma. He isn't handsome like Taylor; he can't dance like Astaire, nor sing like Eddy, and we can't imagine him playing Romeo, but we cast our vote for the best all-round actor on the screen to James Stewart. I have just read the article in MODERN SCREEN called, "He Knows Women," meaning none other than the dashing Errol Flynn. To say the least, it made me boil! You, Mr. Flynn, may be descended from an ape, but certainly I am not.—F. Atnip, Colorado Springs, Colo.

His Jubilee Days

old Chelsea, where hung the triumphant challenge, "Famous Players in Famous Plays." Marguerite Clarke, a diminutive little person who had captivated audiences in "Prunella" and "Baby Mine," was induced to transfer these little classics to the screen. But as the years went by and the pictures in motion began to develop talent of its own, Zukor invaded the bathing beauty area and Gloria Swanson in slithering silks and satins, emerged. Bebe Daniels, Leatrice Joy, Florence Vidor sprang from little parts into startling prominence, and Thomas Meighan, Antonio Moreno and Wallace Reid became responsible for the fluttering of feminine hearts from continent to continent. Emil Jannings and Pola Negri and Chevalier, gay and debonair, were imported from European screens while those grand old character actors, Theodore Roberts and George Fawcett, had the whole world chuckling. The star of Valentino rose dramatically, first noticed in a stirring piece called "The Four Horsemen," and inaugurating a new type of hero as "The Sheik."

From "Queen Elizabeth" to "Champagne Waltz," Mr. Zukor's Jubilee picture, it has been a long and dramatic story. Zukor Jubilee stars, like all his stars throughout the years, are variously assorted. There is Gladys Swarthout, the little Western girl who edged her way into the Metropolitan Opera House, won Mary Garden's coveted shawl and the plaudits of the sophisticated audiences, but couldn't get a foothold in films till the Zukor scouts changed her make-up and packed her off to the Coast.

There is clear-eyed and glamorous Carole Lombard, the essence of smart sophistication of the day, who underwent a plastic surgery operation on her face because of an automobile accident and was being bandied about from studio to studio, Mack Sennett's included, when she got her Paramount foothold. Of English and Scotch descent, her real name is Jane Peters, and if she hadn't become an actress, she would in all probability be one of the smart young matrons of Fort Wayne. What with her social position, her talent for cooking and her flair for beautiful clothes and star sapphires. She can cook anything from eggs to a full course dinner, but won't admit it.

FROM the stage comes Claudette Colbert via France. Practical Claudette, who had supported herself giving French lessons and doing a little art designing on the side, had gone in for dramatics in a desultory sort of fashion when she got a part in "The Barker." All eyes were centered on the bewitching little person with the beautiful figure when Paramount snapped her up and she started her merry journey all the way up to the top, always alluring and beguiling.

Tall and lanky, 6 feet 2½ inches of utter guilelessness, Gary Cooper came from Montana. By turns cowboy and cartoonist, he was persuaded by a girl, who thought she was going to marry him, to leave college, his ranch in Montana, and to try his luck at earning a living. The stalwart Montanan left his native haunts and shyly, almost blushingly, rode his way to fame.

From Weimar, Germany, came a demure little maedchen, the daughter of a Prussian first lieutenant in the patrician regiment of grenadiers, who studied the violin and whose early years were filled with the spectacle of marching soldiers. It is hard to recognize in the serious young violinist the ultra-chic product known as glamorous Marlene Dietrich.

From Broadway, Brooklyn and vaudeville appeared Mae West, wise-cracking, hard-boiled. And also from vaudeville and the radio comes that merry pair of wits and nit-wits, Burns and Allen.

A college band brought Bing Crosby, from Tacoma, Washington. Mrs. Crosby's boy Bing was studying to be a lawyer at Gonzaga College, and sang in the glee club where his vocal efforts were received with such local enthusiasm that Paul Whiteman eventually helped him croon his way to the Cocoanut Grove where Hollywood found him.

With ten letters for his athletic prowess in football, baseball, and track, came Fred MacMurray from Carroll College, Waukesha, Wisconsin, to Broadway, playing the saxophone against his father's wishes. As one of the California Collegians, a co-operative orchestra in "Three's a Crowd," he was seized upon by Paramount scouts and drafted into stardom.

Randolph Scott, a nice horsey young Southerner, born at his family's country place near Orange, Virginia, joined the Pasadena Community Players, after leaving the old homestead and an uneventful bout with engineering in the South. He gave up his real life role as a Southerner, who loved horses and the great out-of-doors, in order to transfer that drawl to the screen.

From Tenth Avenue, New York, hailed George Raft, a hard-working young man who toiled as an electrician's helper for the magnificent sum of $4.00 a week when not going to Public School Number 169. Eventually he danced his way onto the screen.

Not to forget that lusty old comedian, W. C. Fields, who after years of hand-to-mouth existence, struck his stride with a juggling routine which brought fame in the "Follies" and eventually a Paramount contract in his pockets.

PIMPLES? BAD SKIN?

For Real Beauty— You Must Have Soft Alluring Skin . . . Free From Pimples

SMOOTH, satiny skin—a radiantly clear, youthful complexion—men admire them and modern style demands them.

To be truly lovely, you must rid your skin of ugly pimples on face and body. And thousands are doing it, with complete success.

The real cause of disorders resulting in ugly pimples may be nothing in the world except a lack of the yeast vitamins B and G. When these elements are not present in the human diet in sufficient quantities, the intestinal tract becomes weak and sluggish. Its function is badly impaired. Constipation is likely to ensue and this, in turn, often shows up in pimply skin.

Countless men and women have found that in such cases, Yeast Foam Tablets work wonders. This pure dry yeast supplies vitamins B and G in abundant quantities and thus tends to restore the intestinal tract to normal—in those instances of vitamin deficiency. With the intestinal tract again in healthy function, pimples should quickly disappear.

NERVES?

Vitamin B, known as the anti-neuritic vitamin, is absolutely necessary to sound, steady nerves. Lack of enough vitamin B causes polyneuritis—the inflammation of many nerves. Yeast Foam Tablets, so rich in the B factor, prevent and correct nervous conditions caused by vitamin B deficiency.

Unlike ordinary yeast, Yeast Foam Tablets are pasteurized and hence cannot cause gas or fermentation. They are easy to swallow and most people relish their clean, nut-like taste. They keep, too. Start now. Try Yeast Foam Tablets and give them the chance to give you the same welcome relief they have brought to so many others.

GRAY HAIR!
The Best Remedy is Made at Home

Barbo imparts color to streaked, faded or gray hair, makes it soft and glossy and takes years off your looks. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off. Do not be handicapped by gray hair when it is so easy to get rid of it in your own home.

pictures, by Darryl F. Zanuck, vice-president of 20th Century-Fox. A crew of eighty technicians went to Callander, Ontario, to get the gals on celluloid again. Dr. Dafoe will not permit his charges to "work" more than an hour a day. Though the company's schedule called for ten hours' work, or ten days, the unexpected Canadian blizzards delayed outdoor shots to the extent of twenty-four days. . . . Equipment for this trip included $1500 worth of toys, which were all left behind with the exception of the pony carts. Left behind also was the elaborate wardrobe which was especially designed for the young ladies by Royer, studio stylist. . . . Cameraman Dan Clark was again on hand to photograph this picture. Next time, though, he says he'll take along five cameras instead of the two he packed for this trip. Says his subjects were so lively that it will take five cameras to keep track of them and that it's a shame to miss getting any of their antics on celluloid. The Quints are even revising their own scripts this time, some of the things they do and say being too good to leave out. The incident in which Marie picks up Hersholt's snapshot camera and removes the film was her own idea. Marie, incidentally, is the acknowledged comedienne of the sisters and the favorite of Director Norman Taurog. . . . John Qualen, who does such a good job of fathering the Quints in their pictures, has actually never laid eyes on them. All his sequences have been filmed in Hollywood, but as soon as the studio gives him a breathing spell Qualen is hiking off to Callander. . . . Rochelle Hudson is the envy of all the Hollywood girls since she brought back ten white bear rugs from the Canadian wilds.

★★★ Love on the Run

(M-G-M)

Here's a merry little item directed in the fast and furious tradition of W. S. Van Dyke and made terrific by the presence of such box-office champions as Clark Gable, Joan Crawford and Franchot Tone. The story is an impossible sort of thing, which means that due credit is herewith handed to the scenarists for turning out a script full of comical moments and a generous quota of first-class lines. Here's the set-up: Joan Crawford is an heiress about to marry Ivan Lebedeff, a phoney nobleman, while Gable and Tone are London correspondents for New York papers assigned to cover the wedding. Joan jilts Ivan at the altar, and Clark rushes off with her in a plane chartered by Reginald Owen and Mona Barrie, who turn out to be spies—in fact, international spies. The movies continue to portray newspapermen as half clown and half faun, so perhaps Gable and Tone are not to be blamed for falling into the pattern. At any rate, they do it well, with the aid, no doubt, of the Van Dyke touch. Joan Crawford unbends surprisingly in her high comedy moments and handles the romantic interludes in her customary manner. Reginald Owen and Mona Barrie sharply define their spy roles, and Ivan Lebedeff is as phoney a count as you could ask for. It's good fun for all audiences.

Preview Postscript

Clark Gable "faked" that scene where he takes up the plane in blissful ignorance of all its mechanics. For Clark's really a licensed pilot and knows what it's all about—only the studio won't let him prove it, having put a ban on this type of Gable recreation. They won't even let him take that China Clipper trip which has been a suppressed desire of the star for the past year. However, M-G-M couldn't stop Clark covering 25,000 miles of South America last year by air, or keep him on the ground on the completion of this picture. He had three days before reporting for work on "Parnell" and spent them flying between Hollywood and New York. . . . That's Amelia Earhart's $80,000 plane used in this picture. The studio wanted a plane that would most closely resemble a stratosphere plane and Miss Earhart's flying laboratory most closely approximated their needs. . . . Joan and Franchot are making plans to visit England during the Coronation for business as well as pleasure. They have an offer to do a play in London together—a deed they have been contemplating for the past three years, but as yet have found nothing that suits them both. Every spare minute is spent in the Tone Little Theatre in their three-acre backyard play-acting, so they should be pretty good by now.

★★★ Theodora Goes Wild
(Columbia)

This is one of the season's most refreshing and amusing comedies, a film you'll enjoy as much as anything you've seen this year. Besides, it presents Irene Dunne as a delightfully adept comedienne, something no one would have believed after her rather awkward attempt at comedy in "Show Boat." In this one Irene is Theodora Lynn, an extremely proper young lady who resides with two prim maiden aunts. Neither the aunts nor her neighbors in Lynnfield know that Theodora is also Caroline Adams, author of sexy novels. When Theodora pays a secret visit to New York and her publisher, she meets Michael Grant (Melvyn Douglas), an artist a bit on the carefree side, who follows her back to Lynnfield and hangs around until he creates a village scandal. Theodora promptly dashes to New York, moves into Michael's apartment and creates a nice little scandal herself, since the frantic Michael has a wife somewhere in the background. Their romantic turnabout is hilariously funny in the capable hands of Miss Dunne and Mr. Douglas, and much credit is due also to Richard Boleslawski's splendid direction. Thomas Mitchell, Elisabeth Risdon and Spring Byington are outstanding in supporting roles. Besides offering a brand-new Irene Dunne, it's swell entertainment.

Preview Postscript

During his long association with the theatre, Thomas Mitchell has been producer, director, playwright, star and general "play doctor" to ailing stage opuses. Hailing from Elizabeth, N. J., Mitchell got his first taste of the stage when he was seventeen and ran away to join forces with a traveling vaudeville company. After two months of this, he took father's advice and became a newspaper reporter. This led him to Broadway and a dramatic critic's job, which led him back to the stage. Now he's under a three-way contract at Columbia, as writer-director-actor. . . . Rosalind Keith came to pictures through the film city's "showcase." This, in the language of Hollywood, is the aggregate total of the many legitimate theatres strung along Hollywood's famous boulevard. Here many an aspiring young player wangles a job sans salary, or practically none, in the hope of catching the eye of a producer or director. Rosalind came from St. Louis two years ago with the idea of acting in the movies. The movies didn't have that idea until she showed them what they were missing by obtaining a role in "Small Miracle."

(20th Century-Fox)

This is neither Dixie, fish, flesh nor fowl. It is, unfortunately, one of those inept little pictures on which almost everything seems to have gone wrong. Its star, Jane Withers, is buried under an avalanche of stock situations and has little opportunity to display her talents. The story—and don't stop us if you've heard it—gets under way when Jane and Slim Summerville, a traveling minstrel team, wander onto the estate of old Colonel Peachtree (Claude Gillingwater). The Colonel, a proud and penniless son of the Old South, is trying to save the homestead from the clutches of the village banker (Donald Cook), a black-hearted villain who holds the mortgage. Mr. Cook has the temerity to suggest an exchange of the mortgage for the hand of the Colonel's granddaughter, a proposition which met with a round of hisses from the preview audience. But little Jane saves the old plantation and the gal's honor by the simple process of winning an amateur show and rushing back with the money just as wedding bells are about to ring. The plot goes on from there, but we don't. Claude Gillingwater does what he can with the role of the old Colonel, but the dialogue writers are too much for him.

Preview Postscript

No Southern dialogue director was needed for the cast of this picture of the Old South. Jane Withers hails from Atlanta, Georgia, and hasn't forgotten either the corn pone or the accent yet. Helen Wood comes from Clarksville, Tennessee, and had just managed to pronounce r's when the studio called her in for this one; Thomas Beck was born and raised in Baltimore, Maryland; Hattie Hill was once a slave; Slim Summerville, though born in Canada, spent so many years touring the South in road shows that he claims he's a Confederate by environment. . . . Helen Wood and Thomas Beck are teamed romantically for the third time in this film—and off screen they are justlikethis. Helen won a beauty contest in Tennessee which started her on her way to Hollywood. . . . Jane Withers is the most businesslike of all the child actresses about her work. She doesn't believe in wasting a minute's time—for the simple reason that it will mean one minute less of playing with the "kids." However, she manages to lose out on every picture due to a series of casualties. On this one, the door of an auto-trailer fell on Jane and knocked her unconscious for a half hour, she ate just a little too much chocolate cake for one scene and was slightly incapacitated for work, then helped put out a fire in a wagon-load of cotton and suffered a couple of singed fingers and managed to mash a finger with a baseball bat two days before the picture's completion. There's a saying around a Withers' set that Jane can always be located in a split second by tracing down the liniment and iodine odors.

★★ Pennies From Heaven

(Columbia)

The new Bing Crosby opus is a joy and a disappointment. It's a joy because it gives Bing the best set of songs he's ever had, and it's a disappointment because these same songs are so much better than the picture. However, the music will appeal to the Crosby fans, who by this time have probably given up anticipating anything startling in the way of a story in their hero's pictures. Briefly, it has Bing as a happy-go-lucky guy who wanders about the countryside strumming a guitar and boop-a-dooping love ballads to the world in general. He meets Edith Fellowes and her grandfather (Donald Meek), and spends most of the film's remaining reels trying to keep Edith out of the clutches of the county truant officer. The t. o. is Madge Evans, so you know the rest of the story. High spot of the picture is a cafe scene with Lewis Armstrong, the dusky dispenser of song and hot trumpet, rendering "Skeleton in the Closet." Bing's best song is "And So Do I." Almost as effective are "Pennies from Heaven," "Let's Call a Heart a Heart" and "One, Two—Button Your Shoe." Edith Fellowes, who portrays the screen's nastiest brats, is swell in her mean moments and impossible in her nice ones.

Preview Postscript

Bing Crosby, Inc., is one of the film city's busiest corporations. This was true particularly while this picture was being prepared and produced, for the firm had the complete say-so about story, songs, dialogue and the leading lady. Bing himself is president, Brother Everett is secretary-treasurer, Brother Larry is director, with Dad Crosby and Mother Crosby giving the final okay on everything. Bing says he can't wait for the next couple of years to roll by, when he'll have Bing, Jr., and the twins on his payroll, too. . . . Edith is rated the biggest little actress in town. She's thirteen now, has appeared in over one hundred films, wants to be sophisticated, but admits she has the biggest collection of dolls in Hollywood and adores them all. . . . Madge Evans was a "baby star" herself. At the age of five she was starring in "Edith's Burglar," a play that never saw Broadway, but did see the sticks. At thirteen she was John Barrymore's leading lady, and a year later Richard Barthelmess'. To go back to Madge's youth, she was modeling at the age of two—in soap, dress and hat ads. She's still getting neat royalties from the "Madge Evans Hats"—remember?

★★ Go West, Young Man

(Paramount)

In this film you are treated to the spectacle of Mae West burlesquing, of all people, Mae West. In its original stage production, "Go West, Young Man" was "Personal Appearance" and its star, Gladys George, portrayed a high-salaried movie queen on a personal appearance tour. The character played by Miss George reminded many audiences of Our Mae, and now, wonder of wonders, here is the screen version with Mae herself in the role. To those who have seen "Personal Appearance," the West performance will be a distinct disappointment. Those who haven't seen it will witness a typical West portrayal as she struts and swaggers her way through the role of the temperamental film darling. Forced to spend a night in a rural boarding house in Pennsylvania during a cross-country tour, she practises her well-exploited charms on Randolph Scott, a handsome filling-station attendant. All of this is highly perturbing to her press-agent (Warren William) until he hits upon the fine old idea of dragging out a tiny garment and convincing his charge that her roadside Romeo is about to become a father. Alice Brady is lost in the minor role of the boarding-house owner, but Elizabeth Patterson, as Aunt Kate, and Isabel Jewell, as a movie-struck young gal, give outstanding performances. Others in the cast are Lyle Talbot, Jack LaRue, Margaret Perry and Etienne Girardot. The picture is mildly vulgar in the best Mae West tradition, but it doesn't rank with this season's better comedies.

Preview Postscript

Those jools sported by La West are the genuine article, down to the last square-cut diamond, a fact attested to by the stalwart presence of three detectives on the set. Ever since Mae lost that batch of jewelry in a robbery, she's decorated with both detectives and diamonds. . . . This marks the first time any of the present cast has played in a picture with Miss W. and no complaints were heard. There wasn't even in-law trouble with Peter Baikoff, sister Beverly's Russian husband, who plays a minor role. . . . Warren William has played so many sleuth roles in the past years at Warners that finger-printing was second nature to him. . . . Alice Brady, the lady who owns so many dogs, said she would not set foot in any studio which banned her pets. Alice, therefore, came every day with at least three in tow. Checker, Lavinia and Cocktail, all wire-haired terriers. The exclusive Club Norconia, at Corona, where the company went on location, never allowed a dog in the house before. But they rented an entire wing to Miss Brady and five canines for the two weeks of her stay—complete with wire fences to protect the other guests and canvas to protect the floors. . . . Nicodemus, whose real name happens to be plain Horace Stewart, was Mae West's own idea of a colored comedian. She spotted Nic while he was playing in Cab Calloway's orchestra and offered him a role in her next picture. Nic broke out with a new car the hour following his signature on the dotted line. . . . Jack LaRue was Mae's idea of a leading man way back in the "Diamond Lil" days. This is the first time, though, that they've appeared together in celluloid.

Remember this star? It's the Russian Anna Sten and she's much seen about Hollywood these days even though she has no permanent studio connection.

★★ Charlie Chan at the Opera (20th Century-Fox)

Charlie Chan, the wisest Oriental in Hollywood, returns again to his smooth sleuthing and his generous dispensing of proverbs. It is safe to say that this latest of the Chan series is also one of the finest, for it combines an excellent story with a murder mystery which will baffle almost all of the amateur detectives in the audience. Warner Oland, in his customary Chan role, has a worthy foe this time in Boris Karloff—so worthy that in the cast they're billed "Warner Oland vs. Boris Karloff." This time the suave Chinese and his son (Keye Luke) are called in to prevent a murder expected during an opera performance. Karloff, a mad musician escaped from an asylum, is at large in the theatre, and the long finger of suspicion points ominously toward him. There are others concerned, including a couple of young lovers (Charlotte Henry and Tom Beck), but good old Charlie comes through with the solution just when you're beginning to suspect the man in the next seat. As usual, Warner Oland's performance is smooth and ingratiating. Karloff offers swell contrast to the Oriental detective, and in the role of Chan, Jr., Keye Luke definitely brings an important char-

Warner Oland and Boris Karloff have long entertained a deep admiration for each other's screen hokum, but this picture afforded them their first opportunity for meeting. And a fast friendship developed between the two, bound closer by a discovery that both are ardent chess fans—a game that hasn't met with too much popularity around Hollywood. Between "takes" on the set the two were at it constantly. . . . The fact that Oland does not use any screen make-up gave him a decided advantage over Karloff, who had to spend plenty of time with the make-up men while Oland thought about chess. Warner's only make-up technique is to twist the ends of his eyebrows up and the corners of his moustache down. That benign expression is his very own and requires no altering. On his recent trip to China, his first, incidentally, after all these years of looking and acting Oriental, Mr. Oland was taken by the natives as one of them. But both Mr. and Mrs. Oland are as Swedish as Garbo. . . . Boris Karloff was originally trained for service in the Chinese Consulate at Hong Kong—but the training didn't take. It was his family's idea in the first place, his father being in the British Indian Civil Service. So William Henry Pratt, Jr., changed his name to Boris Karloff and decided to disappear from England and family. He set sail for Canada, determined to become a tiller and toiler of the good earth. This lasted until he bought a piece of land and tried it. His next move was Vancouver, where he answered an ad for an "experienced character actor," got the job and did it so well that he quit after that performance and hired himself out to a stock company at considerably better pay, figuring he was considerably more experienced. Here he saved $800, since the manager held out a quarter of his wages every week and paid him at the conclusion of the engagement. So he headed for "big time" in Chicago, had it and then trekked on to New York and on to Hollywood where he struggled along till they realized what a menace Boris Karloff could be.

★ The Jungle Princess

Here's a Tarzan-in-reverse-English sort of picture which serves as the film debut of Dorothy Lamour, a reformed radio singer, who portrays a Malayan gal left an orphan in the jungle with no one to protect her but Lemau, her pet tiger, and Bonga, a congenial ape. Miss Lamour is known only as Oolah, but judging from the way she looks in her scanty jungle raiment, her last name is probably Lah. At any rate, her first contact with civilization comes when she saves the life of Ray Milland, an author, who happens to be on a hunting expedition in her territory. Mr. M. has suffered a sprained ankle, so Oolah takes him to her cave, where he spends a pleasant fortnight with the young lady and her playmates, Lemau and Bonga. Love blooms in the jungle, just as it does in Times Square, so when Milland returns to his hunting camp and his fiancee, Oolah follows him. The natives, who regard her as an evil spirit, capture her with Milland and most of the supporting cast, and are about to do them considerable dirt when Bonga and a group of his simian friends descend from the trees and save the day. With a little strain on the imagination you can have a rather enjoyable time watching this sort of thing. Miss Lamour undoubtedly has a screen career on her hands, and Ray Milland makes his wandering author is believable as possible. There's a good comedy performance by Lynne Overman and a first-rate menace by Mala, the ex-Eskimo.

Preview Postscript

Dorothy Lamour had entertained romantic pictures of the life of a movie actress, only to find herself lost in the wilds with all the conveniences of a construction camp for three months on her first picture. Dorothy hails from New Orleans but lost the accent somewhere over the NBC airwaves where she's been performing for the past year. Married to Herb Kay, Chicago orchestra leader, the two have frequent rendezvous in Kansas City by plane. . . . Molly Lamont is naturally a brunette and that's a wig you see curling so prettily. She's from Johannesburg, South Africa and thinks California has it all beat . . . Ray Milland decided to cook up a little excitement during the long days on location and started on a ping-pong tournament. Knowing Molly was from darkest Africa he offered to teach her the game. She proved a fair pupil, interested at least. And in the tournament proceeded to wallop the entire cast, crew and director, modestly admitting that she's the Johannesburg champ.

★ The Plot Thickens

(RKO-Radio)

Once again James Gleason assumes the role of police inspector and hard-boiled guy out to see that justice is done, no matter what. And once again Hildegarde Withers, the suppressed schoolmarm, shows up to see that Jimmie sees that justice is done. This time Miss Withers is none other than Zasu Pitts and to our mind is the best of the crop of Hildegardes to date. The plot centers around the theft of the famous Cellini cup from the Metropolitan Museum. Everyone, of course, is under suspicion and complications come thick and fast once Jimmie starts stirring things up. The background of the huge museum is excellent to provide a few more thrills and chills as the sleuth and his uninvited assistant, Hildegarde, prowl around on the scent of clues. Romance is supplied by Louise Latimer and Owen Davis, Jr., who handle it capably enough with the small opportunity afforded them. Arthur Aylesworth does a commendable job of buttling and Agnes Anderson and Paul Fix do well by their jobs of chauffeur and maid, respectively, to Richard Tucker, who meets an unhappy end in this film. In short, if mystery murders provide pleasant diversion for you, you won't go wrong on this one.

Preview Postscript

Jimmie Gleason has been the Oscar Piper of all four pictures in this series, but there have been three leading ladies—Edna Mae Oliver for two of them, Helen Broderick for the other. "Penguin Pool Murder," "Murder on a Honeymoon" and "Murder on a Bridle Path" were the other cheerful titles. . . . Jimmie Gleason is back again in the race-horse breeding business. At one time Jimmie had a racing stable of his own, but is more interested in raising them than racing them. He also invented a liniment, after a series of polo falls, that is so good his friends are urging him to market it. Gleason's Glue, the family calls it. Owen Davis, Jr.'s glassy stare on occasion can be blamed on Anne Shirley. She was in New York while this was being filmed and Owen faded visibly every day until her return.

★★ Mad Holiday

(M-G-M)

The holiday taken by the characters in this picture is slightly insane, to put it mildly. Edmund Lowe, Elissa Landi, Ted Healy, Zasu Pitts, Edgar Kennedy and a few others see to that. It's farce from beginning to end, but can't, with justification be called mad farce since some pretty weak gags are included. However, many of the situations are hilarious and the picture is practically bore-proof. Edmund Lowe plays himself here—a movie actor who has played so many roles on the Philo Vance line that he's about ready to commit murder himself. In order to get away from it all, and particularly from Peter Dean, whose brain-waves are the source of all Lowe's pictures, he books passage for a nice, restful ocean trip. Peter Dean, none other than Elissa Landi, books passage on the same ship for a well-earned rest. Ted Healy, a publicity pest, boards the same boat as does Zasu Pitts, who simply adores anything connected with movies.

Married over a year and fond parents, to boot, the Norman Fosters (Sally Blane) look like young lovers as they dance at Joan Bennett's Cocoanut Grove party recently.

NO MORE "DEAD-ARM" IRONING

This is the new way to hot starch without mixing, boiling, straining and uncertainty. It's quite different from solid starches. Being in powdered form you simply moisten Quick Elastic Starch with a little cold water then thin it down with hot water. That's all. No trick at all for you to get any degree of gloss or body desired. This way you are sure of a clear, even mixture. No scum. Nothing to add. No need to cook it. Quick Elastic is practically self-cooking and complete with gliding ingredients. No sticking. No scorching. No spotting. No rings or lumpiness.

Too, you can iron things still damp from the line. This helps greatly on bad days. Even then you press things quickly to gleaming perfection. We would like to have you see how this powdered mixture almost completely restores the fresh charm of newness to all it touches. It "sizes" in the way new goods are "sized". If you try it we feel sure you will change for good to Quick Elastic. Many Never Suspect Cause Of Backaches

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning shows there may be something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

An excess of acids or poisons in your blood, when due to functional kidney disorders, may be the cause of nagging backache, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

Francis Lederer and Margo arrive in New York for "Winterset" opening.

Across-the table notes: Shirley Dean waggles a finger at Russell Gleason during Assistance League luncheon for "Lloyds of London" cast.

With several gentlemen with ulterior motives on board, some pseudo-detectives, a few dope-fiends and drunkards, and a priceless diamond to boot, excitement is a safe bet. But we didn't bank on all those corpses. However, most of them are laughed off in the nonchalant spirit of the picture and everyone, with the possible exception of the latter characters, has a fine time. Elissa Landi is a welcome sight after her year's absence from the screen and does full justice to her role as does Lowe in his usual dependable manner.

Preview Postscript

This is the first picture for both Elissa Landi and Edmund Lowe under their new M-G-M contracts. Elissa recently returned from working in European pictures and visiting around New York and Washington. She's hard at her fifth book at present—and not just hard at encouraging her ghost-writer, for La Landi actually pens her own stuff. Elissa's new horse is named "Meistersinger" in honor of Nino Martini, who spends nine-tenths of his time at the studio watching Elissa or singing to her at her Palos Verdes beach home.

Eddie Lowe used to play fullback on the Santa Clara football team, so this picture's schedule had to be carefully arranged to "shoot around" Eddie on Saturdays before he would sign for the role, since it was to be made during football season. Twice, though, Eddie was detained at the studio so late on Saturday that he had to charter a plane to make the Santa Clara games. Eddie's home town is as famous this year for its team as its prunes, for they haven't lost a game. Now Mr. Lowe is spending all his extra time trying to get them into the Rose Bowl game festivities on New Year's day. . . . Edgar Kennedy's been in pictures since the year one, was in fact one of the first Keystone cops—and a genuine one, which is rare, in this town filled with phoney Keystone cops.

★ Without Orders

(RKO-Radio)

If you're air-minded, you will like this picture. If not, there's a good possibility you will be when the picture's over. "Without Orders" is not a first-class story, it isn't even second-class in some spots, but those scenes directly concerning aviation are fascinating from a technical standpoint and exciting from an adventurous one. A large air-port is the background, with transport flyers, air stewardesses and aviation officials the principal characters. Charles Grapewin, president of the airline, has a son, Vinton Haworth, who is more interested in flying high on terra firma than in the skies. So he appeals to his ace pilot, Robert Armstrong, to make a man of Vinton. The fact that Bob's girl, Sally Eilers, fancies herself in love with Vinton doesn't make this assignment any easier. To add complications to the plot, there's Frances Sage as Sally's sister, who's also mixed up with Vinton. Our heroine is finally brought to her senses when Vinton turns yellow in an air crisis and she has to bring the plane down, with Robert Armstrong giving her directions via radio. The Eilers-Armstrong team turns in adequate performances, and Vinton Haworth is commendable as the weak-kneed son.

Preview Postscript

Robert Armstrong knew a thing or two about planes even before making this celluloider. He was in the air corps during the War. While attending the University of Washington Bob was the White Hope of the football team. But he turned down the team his last year in favor of college dramatics, wrote a skit for the collitch boys and then took it on the road with such success that he never again saw dear old Washington. Having proved his stuff, Uncle Paul Armstrong, producer of Broadway plays, gave Bob a chance in his next production—a little number that lasted two nights but gave Jimmie Gleason the opportunity to spot Bob. Jimmie offered Bob a chance in a play that he guaranteed would last three nights. It was "Is Zat So?" which lasted three years, finally bringing Bob to Hollywood and pitchers. . . . Vinton Haworth, whose screen debut this is, is the uncle of no less than Ginger Rogers. He's married to Mama Lela's sister. Vinton has had radio and stage experience prior to this. He used to be Jack Howard in the Myrt and Marge series.

★ Hideaway Girl

(Paramount)

"Hideaway Girl" tries desperately to be a gay, romantic comedy-with-song. Intended to be a combination of mystery and high comedy, it emerges as just another dismal little imitation of "It Happened One Night." The picture opens with a shot of Shirley Ross, and you are led to suspect that she has just swiped a fancy diamond necklace from a fancy wedding party. In her flight she is forced to stop at a filling station, but the attendant who serves her isn't really an attendant at all; he is Robert Cummings, who, we soon discover, is the possessor of considerable wealth, a barrel of charm, and a yacht. When the two of them start yapping at each other all of us constant movie patrons recognize the time-worn tip-off; they're in love. Things all lead to the Cummings' yacht, a skiff of such proportions most audiences will mistake it for the Queen Mary. After considerable horseplay and plot manipulation we learn that Shirley didn't really steal the necklace at all; the real thief is Mr. Cummings' fiancee, who all the time had been in cahoots with a character named Jake, the Rat. Shirley Ross does nicely considering the circumstances, but Robert Cummings is a bit too debonair for comfort. Major disappointment is Martha Raye in the comedy department. After her swell clowning in "Rhythm on the Range" we expected her to be louder and funnier in this one. She's just louder.

Preview Postscript

Martha Raye is apt to be just as crazy, and sometimes more so, off screen than on. Between "takes" La Raye will oblige at any time with songs and dances—even between takes. An overnight sensation in Hollywood, Martha's lost thirty pounds trying to keep up with it all. A year ago she wasn't sure of her next meal ahead and now she's scheduled for four pictures at a time. The Raye girl is kept hopping between costume fittings, dancing and singing lessons, hairdressers and trying to get to bed for awhile each night. When she couldn't find time for the latter after the close of this picture, Martha retired for a week to the hospital to catch up on it . . . Shirley Ross still can't believe that things are happening the way they really are around her. Appearing with Gus Arnheim's band a couple of years ago at the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel, in Beverly Hills, Shirley was instantly spotted by an M-G-M talent sleuth who whisked his find away from Gus, out to the studio, and signed her to the dotted line before she had time to catch her breath. But she had plenty of time in the next years to do that. For the Ross "find" never got a chance at a part except in "bit" roles. When she heard there might be a chance at Paramount, Shirley gambled all, broke her M-G-M contract and trotted over. The "Big Broadcast" was her first, this her second and next you'll see her with Bing Crosby. . . . Robert Cummings is the Missouri boy who went to England for the sole purpose of acquiring an English accent to impress Hollywood. For Hollywood had long been his goal, but producers took one listen to that Southern drawl and decided Bob was too naïve for he-man roles. Having spent a year in London, Bob came back with the most sophisticated twang in town. And was promptly cast for his first picture—a role, suh, in "So Red the Rose."

★ Smart Blonde

(Warners)

Here's another murder story, enlivened by the girl reporter hot on the trail of the murderer and the handsome detective trying to get there first. After resorting to every under-handed ruse they can think of and every dirty crack not in the dictionary to use on one another, they proceed to fall in love, practically over the corpse. That's the story, but Glenda Farrell's the newshound and Barton MacLane's the sleuth, which considerably improves matters. True enough, some of the gags and situations are a bit aged, but in the competent hands of the leading characters they don't lack punch. Winifred Shaw and Jane Wyman are other highlights of the picture. Miss Shaw gives her usual deft characterization and Jane Wyman walks off with the best laughs in the film.

★ Flying Hostess

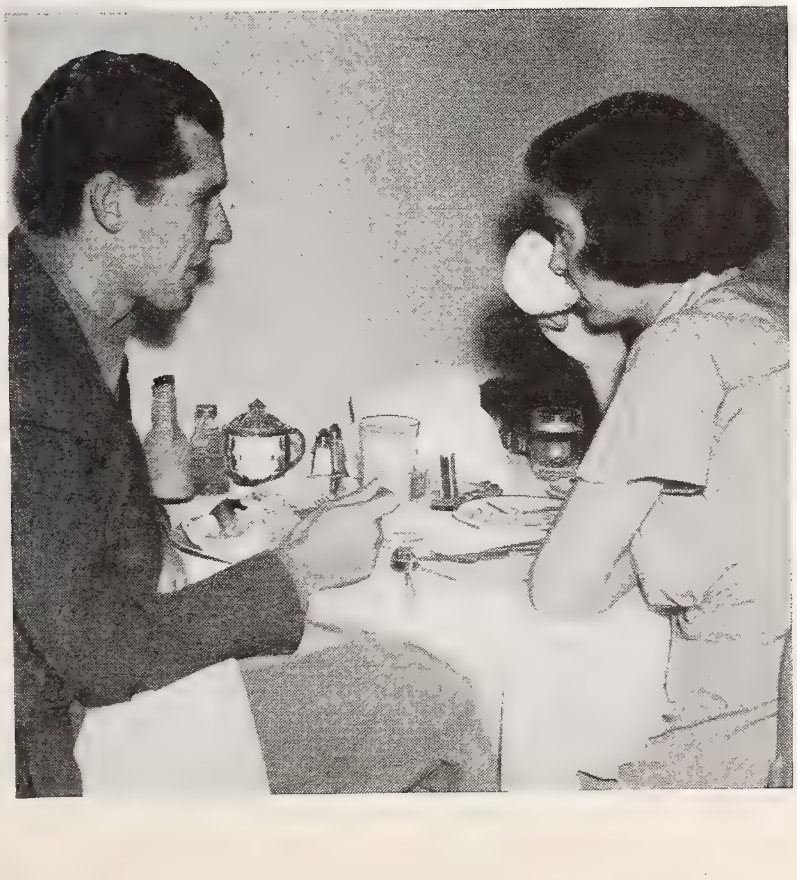
Here's a little number which takes up the subject of airline stewardesses. It makes an interesting story for gals with an eye on that profession and not a bad one for the rest of us to watch. In this case we have three very pretty and determined young ladies out to make the grade. Judith Barrett, one of Universal's new "finds" among the younger crop, is the heroine of the tale. To prove her nerve, after fainting dead away in the first examination, Judith brings down a great big plane all alone, thereby impressing William Gargan, head of the airline, and re-impressing William Hall, the line's star pilot. Ella Logan has a time for herself, too, what with proving her mettle and sparring with Andy Devine. The aviation scenes are well filmed, dialogue is good.



You'll never guess who the gal is in this picture! It's Jean Muir with her hair dyed black for her next picture. The chap is Gordon Oliver, her new romance.

Perhaps most of the gals had seen Dietrich in the desert in "The Garden of Allah," and hoped maybe the open spaces would do something for them. Anyway, there was much carrying on and about, with most of it concentrated at the Racquet Club, owned by Charlie Farrell and Ralph Bellamy. And just to prove that times are good in the desert, Racquet Club memberships which sold for $75, last year, are now retailing at $1000 apiece. Your thousand bucks entitles you to walk right in and buy all the drinks you want.

Want to hear a story about four pigeons? It was told to us by a very close friend, who also happens to be a pigeon, so we know it's true. Well, it seems Kay Francis expressed a desire for pigeons, so George Brent—good old George, they call him—who had a plethora of them gave her four of his. Miss F. took great care of them for several weeks, then let them out for sort of a test flight. They promptly flew right back to the Brent homestead. George and the four birds forgot to tell Kay they were homing pigeons.

The Francis gal, incidentally, is telling all her friends that she'll never marry while she's in pictures. Whether this is just a plea to all her fans to plunk down a quarter for her next picture to keep her single, or whether it's just bad news to gentleman friend Delmer Daves, nobody knows. In the meantime she and Mr. D. are bound for Europe, and if they come back married, just pretend you didn't see this paragraph.

Prediction: The next child star sensation will be 13-year-old Deanna Durbin. We saw a couple of reels of her first picture, "Three Smart Girls," in a projection room at Universal, and it is our duty to report that the young lady has everything that's required. Sort of a combination Shirley Temple and Jeanette MacDonald, which seems like a very fine combination.

A number of hard-working Hollywood heroes don't have much time to indulge in their favorite sports, so they hie themselves to a Turkish bath and get their exercise flat on their backs on the masseur's table. Errol Flynn, who has trouble with his hips, often visits the masseur three or four times a week. "In my pictures," he says sadly, "I'm supposed to look like a wedge." So he takes his pounding, but he doesn't like it.

The David Niven-Merle Oberon romance took a sock in the jaw when Merle recently sailed for England and all the gossip columnists reported that she and David were straining at the leash. What really happened was this: David was spending a week with a friend in North Carolina, prior to shoving off for New York and a goodbye kiss for Merle. Two days before he was to leave, the flu caught up with him, so Merle sailed away with no adieus. But they say she carried a rain check.

One of the shortest flights on record was Clark Gable's trip to New York. He planned a 10-day vacation to see plays, especially "Idiot's Delight," which he is to do for the films. He saw "Idiot's Delight," but he also discovered it was the delight of his fans to mob him wherever he went. So Mr. G., disguised as an unidentified citizen, sneaked through the Holland Tunnel to Newark and grabbed a plane back to Hollywood. Incidentally, when he left for the East, the Sunday airport sightseers were treated to something a little extra when Carole Lombard handed her hero quite a demonstrative send-off.

Bob Montgomery had just returned to Metro for work, after his return from his farm in Connecticut, when a magazine writer swooped down upon him. "Oh, Mr. Montgomery," said the gal, breathlessly, "I'm so glad you're back. I want to get your ideas on love for a symposium I'm writing." "Just symposium I'm not back yet!" said Bob, beating a hasty retreat.

Warner Baxter journeyed to the mountains in Colorado recently to join the elks—but the elks he wanted to get next to were of the four-footed variety. Chester Morris and his wife celebrated their tenth wedding anniversary the other evening with a party gala enough to do justice to such an event in Hollywood. Out on the "I Promise to Pay" set at Columbia we asked Chester about the affair. "It was a nice party. There must have been about three hundred people at the house," he said. "And about half of them, I understand," he added sadly, "are still there."

Fashion Note: Robert Young's three-year-old daughter has always been one of Shirley Temple's more ardent fans. But since her father took her to visit on the "Stowaway" set, Carol Ann's love is more deeply entrenched, for Shirley paid her the finest female compliment known. "That's a very pretty dress, Carol Ann," she said, giving Miss Young's organdie number a critical gaze. "Where did you get it?"

Out at the 20th-Century-Fox studios, where Simone Simon holds forth, there is a new publicity man assigned to the redundant French gal. His name, believe it or not, is Gordon Gordon. But the studio indignantly denies that Simone's next picture is being scripted by a writer on the lot whose name—we swear it on a stack of scenarios—is Arthur Arthur: My! My!

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE . . .

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

[UNTIL SHE SMILES]

She evades close-ups . . . Dingy teeth and tender gums destroy her charm . . . She ignored the warning of "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

How often a girl has thrilled to a passing glance—to an admiring look that says, "If only there were someone to introduce us now."

Lucky for her if she has a youthful smile—a smile that reveals sparkling white teeth and healthy gums. But how pitiful the smile that shocks the expectant eye. How sad the smile that betrays dull teeth and dingy gums—tragic evidence of unforgivable neglect.

NEVER NEGLECT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

That first warning tinge of "pink" on your tooth brush—how harmless it appears and yet how serious it can prove. For trivial, trifling as it may seem—ignored, it can exact a heavy penalty.

When you see it—see your dentist. You may not be in for serious trouble, but your dentist is the only competent judge. Usually, however, he will tell you that yours is simply a case of gums that have grown soft and sensitive under our modern soft-food menus—gums that need more resistance and work—and as so many modern dentists advise—gums that will respond to the healthful stimulation of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage.

For Ipana is a modern tooth paste—not only designed to keep your teeth clean and sparkling—but, with massage, to assist the health of your gums. Rub a little extra Ipana on your gums every time you brush your teeth. Circulation increases. Lazy tissues waken. Gums become firmer.

Play safe! Adopt this common-sense dental health routine in your own home. Change to Ipana and massage today—help safeguard yourself against gum troubles. You'll have a better chance for whiter, brighter teeth and sounder, healthier gums—a better chance for a smile of enchanting loveliness!

A Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer production based on the great stage play that thrilled Broadway for months, with EDNA MAY OLIVER, BILLIE BURKE, and a great M-G-M cast. Directed and produced by John Stahl.

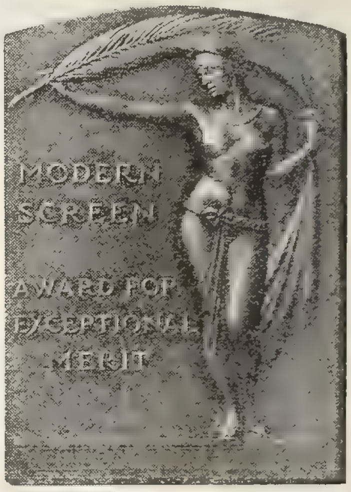
Leo Townsend, our Hollywood editor, presents the placque of Modern Screen's Award of Merit to the all-male cast of "Captains Courageous." Here you see him in the act of giving it to one of its stars, Spencer Tracy. This monthly award is considered a signal honor.

We Salute . . . "CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS"

To all those who worked so successfully to make "Captains Courageous" a brilliant picture, we tender our sincere congratulations.

Again Modern Screen singles out the outstanding picture of the month for its distinguished Award of Merit. Only those pictures rate the medal which we think offer you the best in entertainment value. These about-to-be-released pictures are the tops in acting, scenario, direction and photography—productions worthy of leading your screen fare for the year. By watching for our monthly award, you will never spend a dull evening in the theatre. It's certified entertainment for you!

Great credit is due the robust direction of Victor Fleming together with John Lee Mahin's excellent script. You who enjoyed the original Rudyard Kipling tale will not be disappointed, for all the tang and flavor has been retained in the screen version. It's a faithful transcription of a much beloved story.



Modern Screen's Medal Award Picture, "Captains Courageous," an M-G-M production, reviewed by Leo Townsend

Rudyard Kipling's well-known tale of adventure at sea comes to the screen as decidedly first-rate entertainment, full of action and down-to-earth appeal. Primarily a man's picture—there are no women in the cast—it will also appeal to the ladies because of the presence of Freddie Bartholomew in what is perhaps his biggest and best film role to date. Co-starred with Spencer Tracy and Lionel Barrymore, young Mr. Bartholomew continues to prove himself a most precocious youngster. In the role of Harvey Cheyne, a haughty little millionaire's son who learns about life when he accidentally falls in with a fishing boat crew, Freddie's work in this picture should convince his producers of his versatility and allow him a wider choice of screen roles.

Briefly, the story is this: when Harvey tries in vain to buy his way into a school club he runs home to his father with a tale of abuse. The doting papa (Melvyn Douglas) withdraws him from school and the two embark for England. Shortly after the boat sails, Harvey, showing off before some fellow passengers, falls overboard. A fishing boat picks him up and Harvey demands he be taken ashore immediately. But millionaires' sons mean nothing to the fishermen—and they can't return to shore until they've made their catch, a little matter of three months. Harvey proceeds to make himself obnoxious until, under the guidance of Manuel (Spencer Tracy), one of the fishermen, he gradually begins to see the light.

Eventually he becomes fast friends with Manuel and the crew, until finally even Captain Disko (Lionel Barrymore) admits Harvey has become a more than tolerable young man. When the haul is finished and the boat heads back to Gloucester, drama and tragedy strike them, and Manuel loses his life at sea. When the boat lands, Harvey's father is waiting for him, and he sees in his grief-stricken son a new and finer person—a boy who learned in three months what a lifetime of ease would never have taught him.

Spencer Tracy lends his expert trouping to the role of Manuel, making it one of the most sympathetic characters he has brought to the screen. One of Hollywood's finest actors, he will add considerably to his popularity as well as his prestige with this warmly human performance. Lionel Barrymore is gruff and convincing as Captain Disko, and Melvyn Douglas, who is finally getting the screen recognition he deserves, is capable as the father. Outstanding supporting players are John Carradine, Mickey Rooney, Charles Grapewin and Billy Burrud.

Protect precious enamel . . . win flashing new luster and Be Safe . . . change to Pepsodent Tooth Paste containing IRIUM!

Nature is lavish in restoring skin, hair, nails. But She's terribly stingy with tooth enamel. Once you allow it to be injured, or you permit film to start its deadly decay, enamel can never grow back—never.

That is why the discovery of IRIUM has caused such a sensation in the dentifrice world. The flashing new luster it brings with safety is causing new thousands every day to change to Pepsodent, the only tooth paste containing IRIUM.

Acts on new principle

Instead of acting on enamel with scrub-hard friction, Pepsodent containing IRIUM softens the tough film that forms and glues itself on teeth and gums. Then gently lifts and floats it away —polishes the enamel to a brilliant sparkle you have never even seen before—and imparts a new, firm, refreshed feeling to the gums.

You get a new taste-thrill out of eating, drinking, smoking! And bad breath——caused by film on teeth which ordinary tooth pastes fail to remove completely—is no longer a worry to you! For the first time you know what cleanliness of mouth, teeth and gums really means!

Be safe every day of your life! Get results always hoped for but never experienced with a dentifrice–and get them with safety! Change to Pepsodent Tooth Paste containing IRIUM.

You're the public and you give the orders! So don't keep your flicker interests a deep dark secret any longer.

JAMES STEWART (Last printed August, 1936. Total number of requests since then 197.) Fullgrown, the boy measured 6 feet 3 inches tall, skin and bones at 140 pounds. He wore glasses and played an accordion with his chin slumped down on his chest, his long legs sprawled out. His birthplace was Indiana, Pa., where his "paw" was engaged in the hardware business. Portrait of an actor? Portrait of a Princeton grad? Scarcely either, and yet James Stewart is both. Four years as a student of architecture equipped him to design anything from a pig pen to a royal palace. But unfortunately, he hadn't been taught to create any design for living without a job while he waited for recognition from America's architects. So with haste that was almost impolite, he snapped up a stock offer from Falmouth, Mass. He might have been a bit more reluctant, had be known that the job didn't call for Stewart the actor, but for Stewart the accordionist. And indeed, his career was to follow to some extent a path charted by his gifts as a musician. But musician or no, the lad could act. Successful stock roles brought him to Broadway; stellar performances in hits such as "Yellow Jack" and "Page Miss Glory" (the stage version) brought him to Hollywood with a long term M-G-M contract. Not long after, he was cast as Jeanette MacDonald's erring brother in "Rose Marie." Location was on the shores of Lake Tahoe. Jimmy roomed with Director Van Dyke, and when the chill night of the lake country drove everyone indoors, the magic of Jimmy's accordion would combine with the distant lapping of water to lull Van Dyke to sleep. Van Dyke was grateful. Later, inviting guests to a party, he asked, "What's the name of that guy who plays the accordion?" Jimmy is very jealous of that accordion . . . thinks people pay it more attention than they do him. And it's the same story with his dancing. He's a swell partner and a bit afraid that lovely ladies Eleanor Powell, or Virginia Bruce, or Ginger Rogers favor him because he dances well and not because they're fond of him. Shows you how very little Jimmy knows about women. Jimmy was born on May 20, 1908. He doesn't wear glasses any more and isn't as skinny as he used to be. You'll be seeing him soon in "Seventh Heaven" opposite Simone Simon. His current picture is "Born to Dance."

HILDA BENEVY, Montreal, Canada: Marlene Dietrich's real name is Mary Magdalene von Losch. Her father, a lieutenant in the German army, died the death of a hero, during the World War. Incidentally, Marlene met the man who was responsible—Alexie Davidoff, wartime commander of the Russian "suicide" battery—on the set of one of her pictures and parted good friends with him.

JAMES CAGNEY (Last printed February, 1936. Total number of requests since then 209.) One definition of good acting is versatile acting. An actor delights you if he can do Hamlet, Dillinger, and Lord Fauntleroy. In the case of James Cagney this criterion is beside the point. Cagney couldn't do Hamlet. Or if he could, you wouldn't want him to. You want Cagney to be Cagney and no one else. And that's a good definition of personality! The redheaded Irishman's personality captivates you because you understand subconsciously that you see in him the symbol of all that a big city means to you. Especially New York . . . New York the melting pot, New York the hurly-burly commercial center, New York the hybrid of stately skyscrapers and swarming tenements. All that and then some is in Cagney's blood, comes alive in his acting . . . the way he moves, the way he talks, the way he hits. And that combination of vulgarity with education and sophistication . . . that's Jimmy, too. He's been a vaudevillian, the tough, flexible type that sings, dances, speaks Yiddish like a Litvak, Italian like a Siciliano, and can help out the acrobats if one of them gets sick. But he's also spent two years in Columbia University . . . would have graduated and been a doctor like his two brothers, if his father's saloon on Eighth Street, Avenue D, hadn't gone bust . . . which meant that Jimmy had to pitch in and help feed a destitute family. He pitched in, all right! For five chaotic years he toured the small towns . . . the Cagney circuit is what he calls the route. Then to Broadway with a roughneck role in Maxwell Anderson's "Outside Looking In." A short while later his road crossed Joan Blondell's. He stayed on that road. It led directly to Hollywood and a Warner Brothers' contract. A little over a year ago, Jimmy broke his ties with Warners.

MAGGY ROUFF
Famous Fashion Designer of Paris

"The lovely jeunes filles who model my fashion creations are slim, fresh, erect. Their complexions have the glorious tint of the rose petal, and one reason is their use of Woodbury's powder.

"Very glamorous, very chic are the shades of this famous powder which you American women know so well. Yet it is not alone for Woodbury's beauty that I advise my mannequins to use it. A disaster these girls must avoid is a disfiguring blemish. And Woodbury's powder is free of the germs that cause skin infections*. Naturally, no blemish-germs can come to the face from this germ-free powder."

Woodbury's Facial Powder comes in six enchanting skin-tone shades, for every type of complexion. $1.00, 50¢, 25¢, 10¢.

THE INSIDE STORY OF "MAID OF SALEM"

By FRANK LLOYD

(Director of "Cavalcade", "The Sea Hawk", "Mutiny on the Bounty")

Frank Lloyd looking for a new screen yarn.

NATURALLY, ever since "Mutiny on the Bounty" swept the country, I've been on the lookout for another yarn with the same sweep and power to bring to the screen. I wanted a story with plenty of drama and with plenty of chance for me to direct big out of doors scenes, the kind I get the most kick out of.

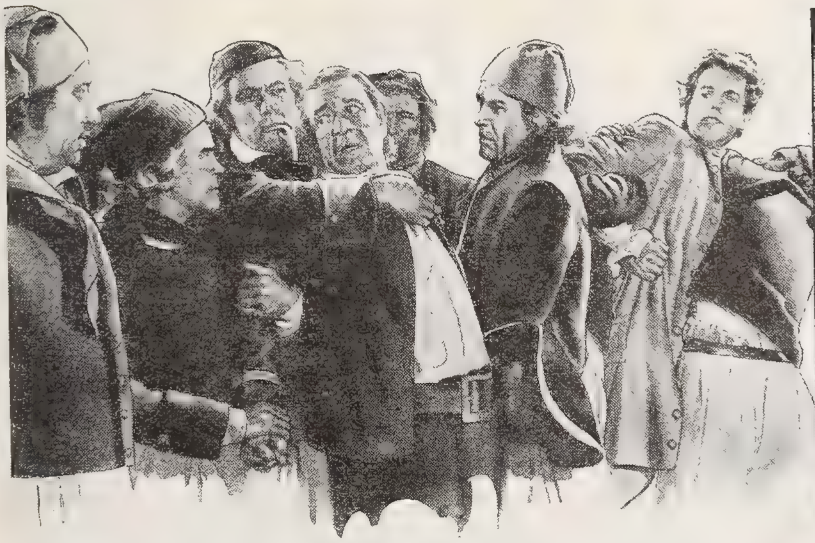
» Well, to make a long story short, I found just such a yarn . . ."Maid of Salem". Here is the story of a young girl and a young lad who have the nerve to fight off a whole town of fanatics who try to break up their love . . . a story with the same drive and surge of "Mutiny". For here love and courage face the fanatic venom of a whole mob of Captain Blighs.

» But finding a story is only half a director's battle. The next thing was to find stars able to play the parts. I had recently directed Claudette Colbert in "Under Two Flags" and knew what she could do in a highly emotional part. Fortunately, I was able to cast her as the stout-hearted little "Maid of Salem". A hero? I needed a swashbuckling, hard-boiled lad who could carve his way with a cutlass through an armed mob, with a grin on his face . . . I found him. Fred MacMurray, I honestly believe, does as fine a job in this picture as any of the heroes of my big adventure pictures. The girls are going to say it's Fred's swellest part.

» Last but not least a producer-director has got to have freedom to make a picture his own way. I, personally, want my pictures absolutely authentic. If it's an historical picture, I want my history correct. Well, let me say, right here and now, Paramount has made this, my first picture for their company, the easiest I have ever worked on. For they have told me to spare no expense to make "Maid of Salem" the most authentic, the most powerful of my productions. So I think when you see "Maid of Salem" you will agree with me that it tops them all for sheer entertainment.

Frank Lloyd on the set with Claudette Colbert as the cameras start cranking for "Maid of Salem".

Claudette Colbert in her greatest part, as the young New England girl who dares the wrath of a whole countryside for the love of her dashing Southern hero . . . . .



A typical Lloyd action scene, a bunch of hard-boiled vagabonds pitting their strength against the courage of one tough lad and his stout sword arm . . . . .

Fred MacMurray in his first big historical role since "The Texas Rangers", as a swashbuckling Southern gentleman who can carve his way through any mob with his good sword . . . . .

THIS CABALLERO CAN

Take a lesson from Leo Carrillo in the art of making Mexican dishes

By Marjorie Deen

Invitations to Leo Carrillo's Barbecue Parties are eagerly sought by Hollywood-ites. Here is Leo preparing for "company."

Mr. C. prepares Chili Con Carne. You see him grinding the chili peppers in a stone mixing bowl with a stone crusher.

(Below) Though Willie has cooked for six Presidents, he stays in the background when his boss is juggling recipes.

SEÑORES and señoritas, allow me to present Leo Carrillo, the most native of California's native sons, a gay caballero (gentleman, to you), a fine actor, one of the movie colony's most popular hosts and a perfectly elegant cook! Both he and his wife are the most hospitable of souls, their home is one of the show places of Southern California, their food is remembered by all who have ever tasted it and their parties are famous.

Small wonder, then, that your Modern Hostess accepted with enthusiasm an invitation to visit the Carrillo's ten-acre estate out in Uplifter's Canyon in Santa Monica. For I knew in advance that here was a grand chance to learn about the most fascinating foods that were ever grown, cooked and served on California soil. Furthermore, I was certain to get my information and the recipes I wanted in an atmosphere as Mexican as the roles Mr. Carrillo has played in such pictures as "Viva Villa" and "The Gay Desperado."

Five generations of California-Spanish dons explains the fire, humor and romance that Carrillo brings to such roles as these; explains even more clearly the authentic early-California atmosphere of his home and his interest in foods of Spanish-Mexican inspiration.

Here, then, was a golden opportunity to learn more about these things, with a real California native son to act as guide and mentor. So let's first talk over the Carrillo foods that I heard about and the recipes that I secured for you (and for me, too, you can bet, because I share with countless others a real liking for this type of cooking).

A description of the Carrillo place, with all its mellow charm of another and less hurried age, must wait then until we've disposed of the more practical and helpful aspects of my recent visit. The most useful knowledge that I can pass on to you at this moment is the fact that the recipes which you do not find at the end of this article you will find in this month's leaflet—which the coupon, also at the end of the article, brings to you absolutely free. If the recipes for Leo Carrillo's famous dishes aren't worth a penny postal or a stamp—and the little time it takes to fill in a coupon—then, sez I, hundreds of Carrillo guests, who have sung the praises of his cooking, must be wrong! I, for one, know that they're not.

Shortly after I had arrived at the Carrillos' huge, rambling house we all gathered in the large, cheerful kitchen, for our cooking talk. There were six of us, Mr. and Mrs. Carrillo, their young daughter, the photographer, who was on hand to snap those interesting pictures of our host in action, yours truly and, hovering around solicitously, Willie, the "cullud" cook ready and willing to supply ingredients, utensils and a helping hand at the drop of a sombrero.

Willie, incidentally, is quite a personage himself. He has been all over the world. He has cooked for six Presidents while travelling on their private cars. He learned about Mexican foods when he worked for Obregon. But he says he's going to stay with "Mistah (Continued on page 98)

Send in for Leo Carrillo's excellent Mexican recipes and you'll be as delighted with the results of your Chili as our host is with his.

DON'T MENTION THAT COUSIN OF YOURS! SHE LEFT THIS TATTLE-TALE GRAY AD ON MY PILLOW. I'M MAD CLEAR THROUGH.
WAIT A MINUTE, LOUISE. I'VE NOTICED YOUR LINENS DON'T LOOK SO HOT, AND THIS AD SAYS TATTLE-TALE GRAY GETS INTO CLOTHES WHEN YOUR SOAP IS LAZY, AND LEAVES DIRT BEHIND.
SO WHAT?
SO I'D TAKE THE TIP, INSTEAD OF BEING SORE, AND CHANGE TO FELS-NAPTHA SOAP. FELS-NAPTHA MAKES CLOTHES WHITER, THIS SAYS, BECAUSE ITS RICHER GOLDEN SOAP AND LOTS OF NAPTHA GET OUT ALL THE DIRT.
OH, ALL RIGHT! I'LL GIVE IT A TRY.

SORE ABOUT THAT AD YOU LEFT, MADGE? WHY, THAT FELS-NAPTHA AD IS THE REASON WE'RE TAKING YOU TO THE THEATRE.

HOW the doctor chooses from hundreds of laxatives

MOST of us remember, with gratitude, some crisis in our lives when the doctor's vigilance and skill proved priceless beyond words.

But many of us forget that the doctor is equally on guard in minor matters of health. Consider a little thing like a laxative, for example. It may be news to you that the doctor has a definite set of standards which a laxative must meet before he will approve it.

Check the eight specifications listed below. How many of them will your own laxative meet?

THE DOCTOR'S TEST OF A LAXATIVE:

It should be dependable.
It should be mild and gentle.
It should be thorough.
Its merit should be proved by the test of time.
It should not form a habit.
It should not over-act.
It should not cause stomach pains.
It should not nauseate, or upset digestion.

EX-LAX MEETS ALL THESE REQUIREMENTS

Ex-Lax checks on every single one of the points listed above. Meets the doctor's demands of a laxative fairly and fully. So it's no surprise to find that many doctors use Ex-Lax in their own homes, for their own families. In fact, Ex-Lax has made so many millions of friends, among all kinds of people, that it is the most widely used laxative in the whole wide world.

A REAL PLEASURE TO TAKE

Convince yourself of the facts. Try Ex-Lax the next time you need a laxative. You'll find that Ex-Lax is mild . . . that it is thorough. You'll discover that it does not bring on stomach pains or nausea. On the contrary, the easy comfortable action of Ex-Lax will leave you with a pleasant sense of freshness and well-being. Children, particularly, are benefited. For the standards set up by the doctor are doubly important to a child.

Another agreeable thing . . . if you have been taking bitter, nauseating cathartics, Ex-Lax will be a pleasant surprise. For it tastes just like delicious chocolate. All drug stores have Ex-Lax in 10c and 25c sizes. If you prefer to try Ex-Lax at our expense, mail the coupon below.

SHE DOES AS SHE PLEASES

By Ramona Bergere

Meet Patsy Kelly, chief exponent of the "Be Yourself" school

WHAT CAN you expect from someone who was born under a piano and forgotten and left at the church after her christening? With a start like that, could anyone be expected to be dignified? Three loud and lusty Nos! And Patsy Kelly is anything but ultra-ultra. She does as she pleases and the people around her know better than to try to change her. She also says what she pleases and isn't at all hampered by the convention that a lady never shouts nor swears.

Her credo is, "Be yourself." She simply cannot stand affectations. Many an actor who is trying to forget a middle-class background by adopting a pseudo accent and a family tree has had his memory jogged in a painfully public manner by Patsy. Yet she is the kindest person in the world and falls for every hard-luck story she hears. But she does believe that a four-flusher deserves to have his sails trimmed.

THAT doesn't mean that The Kelly is hard to get along with. She's anything but! However, let someone pull a fast one and he doesn't escape her righteous wrath. Then, her vocabulary becomes rich and pointed.

To say she does as she pleases doesn't go for her work. She is as eager and enthusiastic as a child about that. She has only two bosses and their word is law with her. One is her director. The other, her fans.

She still can't get over receiving fan mail and the fact that people seem to like her. She asks, "Are they crazy or am I?" and adds with a hint of wistfulness in her voice, "I don't think they're kidding me, do you?"

Doing as she pleases has to do not only with the way she thinks but with the way she conducts herself and dresses. She practically never wears a hat and is probably the worst-dressed woman in Hollywood. She is much funnier looking actually than she is on the screen. She is overweight and loves to eat.

A short time ago an out-of-towner, on the over-plump side herself, rushed up to Patsy after a preview and cried, "Why, everyone says you're overweight. I don't think you are at all." Patsy gave her the once-over and said, "Oh, no? Say, I'm so fat my stomach goes on the screen ten minutes before I do." She continued, "But it doesn't matter. Who'm I trying to catch anyway?"

SHE IS entirely without vanity. If she wants to push her hair back of her ears, she does. That, by the way, is as much a part of her as her walk and voice. When she isn't before the camera, back goes the hair. She has lovely hands and it is a comically characteristic gesture to see her hand, limp-wristed, carelessly sweep back those black locks from her face. She says, "You can't do much for this mug anyway," and never goes near a beauty parlor.

Her lack of vanity and her freedom from its fetters is the reason for her success as a comedienne. Can you see a "glamor girl," who spends most of her time in the beauty shops, disarranging her carefully placed locks, distorting her face in natural, unrestrained grimaces, or throwing her rolled and massaged body around in awkward positions?

ANOTHER thing, Patsy believes in good, old relaxed comfort. If she wants to sprawl, she sprawls. If she wants to corkscrew herself over the arm of a chair, she does. And her walk is as near a sailor's roll as the swagger of an old salt.

She has had to work too hard, has seen too much of life's hard knocks, to waste her time on superficialities and a "front." She hasn't had time to acquire cute little feminine mannerisms. At the age when most girls are primping and posing in their effort to attract the boys, she was working. When she grew old enough to miss them she had the good sense to realize they were a handicap to her career rather than an asset.

Then there is the question of environment. There couldn't have been much time nor space in the small Kelly apartment for the acquisition of culture. There were the little Kellys besides papa and mama, to say nothing of the shabby, twanging, old baby-grand piano. Which brings us back to its significance in Patsy's life.

Mrs. Kelly, from the things Patsy tells of her, must have epitomized a Kathleen Norris heroine. She did wonders with Papa Kelly's small and uncertain pay envelope. She fought that her children might have music and know how to dance. How she ever managed the piano was just another of those Irish miracles. Above all else, she was a conscientious housekeeper and the fact that another little Kelly was imminent did not keep her from her daily housework. The piano needed dusting and, with true Irish directness, she went down on her hands and knees under it to dust its legs.

At that inauspicious moment Patsy decided to make her debut into the world. Mother Kelly had nothing to say about it and Patsy got herself born right there under the piano. Now there is dignity to being born in a nice white bed with doctors and nurses in attendance. But under the piano! A thing like that is hard to live down and Patsy hasn't seemed to make much effort to do so.

Another trait for which she is famous, or infamous, is her complete lack of a sense of time. It can be four o'clock in the afternoon

"I need a daily MENNEN OIL RUB to keep me safe from germs"

"Is it fair—I ask you—to let me fight all alone 'gainst those germs that are always landin' on my skin? Gosh . . . the way folks sterilize my dishes and bottles you'd think my insides were more exposed to germs than my outsides. But, believe me, my outsides need protection too. That's why—over at the hospital where I was born—they gave me a rub every day with Mennen Antiseptic Oil. I heard 'em say that I ought to have a body rub like that for years. But I guess my Mommy has forgot. So won't somebody tell her, please, to keep my skin safe from germs—with Mennen Antiseptic Oil?"

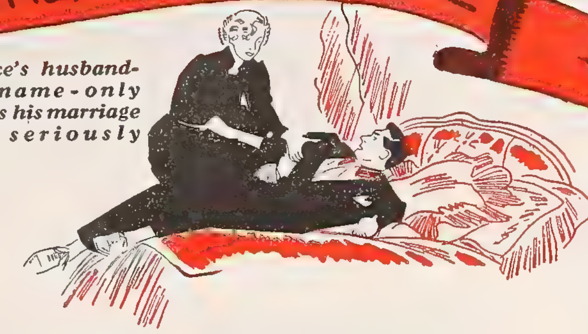
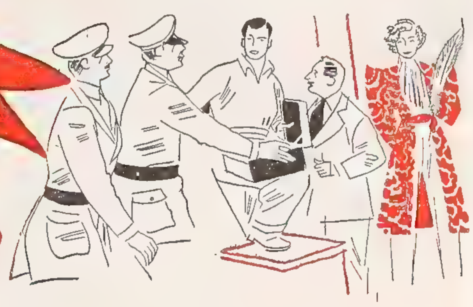
You'll find this chart simple to follow and a valuable guide in choosing film entertainment. Instead of giving you the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 5★, extraordinary; 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

RUSSELL PATTERSON'S
MONTHLY HIT PARADE



Grace's husband-in-name-only takes his marriage too seriously



His "passport bride" sicks the Mexican gendarmes on Cary Grant

GRACE MOORE

Heads Hit List in New Song-Filled Triumph,

"When You're In Love"

TWO thousand dollars for a husband! That's the fee Louise Fuller, famed opera star, paid a total stranger to marry her. And that's the start of one of the most scintillating, side-splitting romances I've ever laughed through—Grace Moore's stunning new hit, "When You're In Love", with Cary Grant.

Of course, any film of Grace's is aces with me. But "When You're In Love" is even several notches better, to my way of thinking, than "One Night of Love" or "The King Steps Out"

The star who started a new style in song-films hits some new vocal highs in music numbers by Jerome Kern and Dorothy Fields, which include the soon-to-be-famous "Our Song".

The cast is loaded for comedy with such notables as Cary Grant, Aline MacMahon, Luis Alberni, Henry Stephenson, Catherine Doucet, and Thomas Mitchell.

Robert Riskin, as I've already hinted, delivered a fun-packed, fast-moving screen play, and followed it up with the smartest kind of direction, in collaboration with Harry Lachman. And Columbia Pictures have treated their talented star to an elaborate production that hits scenic highspots from New York to Mexico.

You can say I said that Grace Moore in "When You're In Love" is my favorite amusement of the month. It's way out in front of the February hit parade.

worries of underweight or
JOYS of added weight

It is now common knowledge that the three foremost things in restoring lost weight are food . . . digestive juices . . . and red-blood-cells.

Digestive juices of the stomach make use of the food you eat . . . red-blood-cells aid in turning the digested food into firm flesh. S.S.S. Tonic is of great benefit in both.

S.S.S. Tonic whets the appetite. Foods taste better . . . natural digestive juices are stimulated and finally the very food you eat is of more body value. A very important step back to health.

Forget about underweight worries if you are deficient in stomach digestive juices and red-blood-cells . . . just take S.S.S. Tonic immediately before each meal. Shortly you will be delighted with the way you will feel . . . your friends will compliment you on the way you will look.

S.S.S. Tonic is especially designed to build sturdy health . . . its remarkable value is time tried and scientifically proven . . . that's why it makes you feel like yourself again.

At all drug stores in two convenient sizes. The large size at a saving in price. There is no substitute for this time tested remedy. No ethical druggist will suggest something "just as good."

Prematurely Starred?

Whoever was responsible for the advance notices of "Girls' Dormitory" was building up to an awful let-down. Without such enthusiastic praise and over-ardent billing, Simone Simon might have made more of a hit. They brought her on an unsuspecting public with all the attendant ballyhoo possible and she didn't live up to it.

True, her accent is delightful—for the first hour or so. Too, she has a rather pixie-like quality of charm, disregarding the spoiled expression of her mouth.

Casting her in "Ladies in Love" was another mistake. She seemed like a middle-aged woman, trying hard to act the ingenue. I'm not blaming Simone Simon. The fault lies, I think, with the studio for not building her up in bit roles so we could get used to her and so that she, in turn, could learn what the public expects from new stars.—Ruth Kilbourne, Altadena, Calif.

What does Joan Crawford lack?

I've tried to find out for a long time why Joan Crawford ranks among the great stars. It is plain as day that she is putting on an act the entire time she appears on the screen. I am only one of many fans who thinks that whatever charm or refinement she may possess in private life is entirely absent on the screen.

The motion picture patron wants, above all, to escape from mental strain and to live the events portrayed in the picture, while viewing same.

Frankly, what are your thoughts on leaving Miss Crawford's pictures? "Her gowns were beautiful." "The scenery was elaborate." "Wasn't Robert Taylor delightful?" But did she lift you out of the every-day line of thought and make you forget yourself, with real acting? Was there depth of feeling in her face? I've never seen it.—Ethel Henderson, Wenatchee, Washington.

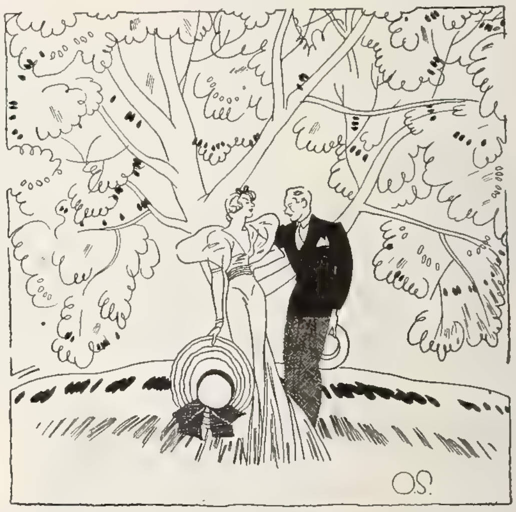
Ideal Date

I'm just a small-town girl and that's why I like James Stewart. Somehow he looks like a small-town boy—like the boy who lives across the street and drives a rattling Model T Ford. The kind who never made the football team in high school, but was an excellent "bench-warmer," who graduated and now has a job delivering milk for the dairy.

He looks like the sort of boy I'd like to go with. I wouldn't want to have a date with someone like Robert Taylor 'cause he's too good-looking to be true, a boy like James Cagney would be cute but too smarty and one like Clark Gable would be too old for me and I'd have to be too particular about the way I looked and acted. But Jimmy Stewart would take me to the beach and buy me hamburgers and rootbeer and wouldn't care much when I got scared on the roller-coaster.—Patricia Ramsaur, Westmorland, Calif.



Having a date with Jimmy Stewart is one gal's idea of the tops.

Thanks, Georgia

To Modern Screen I am forever grateful and I'd so like to lustily shout "Bravo" for your superb selection of "Lost Horizon" as the film most worthy of the Medal Award last month.

Having so admired James Hilton's dramatic novel, I was a bit skeptical about the film's success. There is nothing quite so capable of rendering that well-known let-down feeling as seeing a favorite story unsuitably cast. Not so, "Lost Horizon"—its characters vividly took life under expert casting.

'N' ME

I can imagine no star who could portray Bob Conway with quite as much understanding as does Ronald Colman—his performance lacked nothing. In fact, it was a relief and a great pleasure to see each of the roles handled so adroitly. Isabel Jewell deserves much praise for her sincere work—she enacted the role of "Gloria" with much ingenuity and a surprising finesse.

Thanks again for your magnificent choice—it increased my admiration for your magazine ever so much.—Mrs. Preston Chapman, Atlanta, Georgia.

A fan from way up Washington way has a few things to say about Joan Crawford.

An Open Letter to Errol Flynn

In the very short time you have been on the screen, I learned to like you very much, because I imagined you to be the same type of man in real life as you were on the screen.

After reading the interview you gave in the December issue of MODERN SCREEN, I think you're just a punk. You say you know women are inferior to men, because you've traveled in many different countries and have seen examples of their inferiority. But you forget that not all countries are like our own United States, which allows freedom to women and men alike, instead of making our lovely ladies slaves to their men.

If you were handsome like Nelson Eddy or Clark Gable and talked the way you did, it might have been all right, but after all, I suppose you know you're not handsome; therefore, you should be glad to be married to any woman and be a devoted mate instead of making a slave of her.

Remember, Mr. Flynn, that women have made stars and women have broken stars! You'd better start saving for a forced retirement or it won't be so easy for you to meet the future. An ex-fan.—Ellen McCollum, Camden, N. J.

We Want Keeler and Powell

Now that Dick Powell has convinced us that he can wear short pants and croon in French (viz. "Hearts Divided"), that he can wear a mustache (viz. "Stage Struck"), that he can "pull the strings" that mean "breaks" for Joan Blondell in nearly every Warner picture made, I think it's too bad that Ruby Keeler, the girl who, with her perfect team-work, was responsible for Dick's early success, has had but one role in six months! We don't blame Powell for falling in love with and marrying the vivacious Blondell, but why let back-stage romance break up the grandest box-office team in the movies?

IT'S YOUR GUARANTEE OF THE BEST IN ENTERTAINMENT!

Mrs. MacMurray's young hopeful looked like this as a baby. Pretty cute, wasn't he?

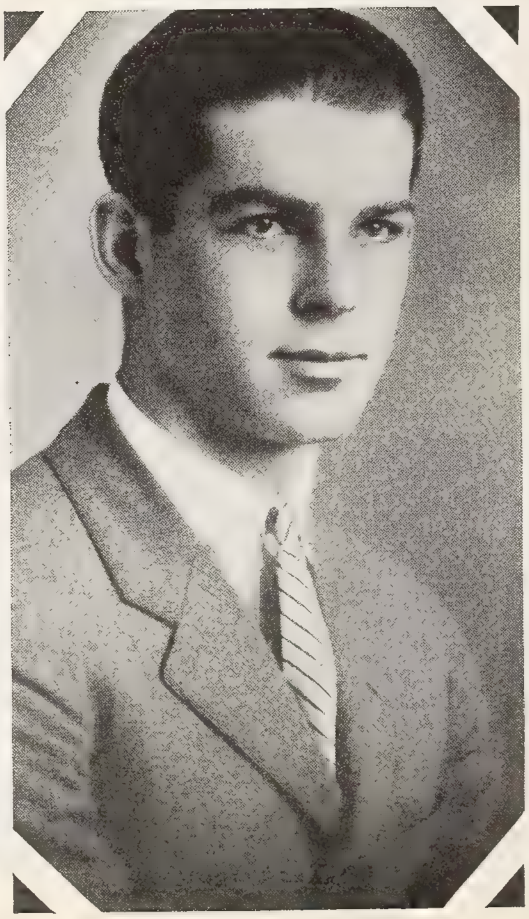
At three, Beaver Dam was treated to this sight of Fred in his natty Sunday best.

Master Fred showed musical promise at four years, playing the violin precociously.

FRED MacMURRAY...WHEN-

Age ten—and our hero poses with a professor's collie at Wisconsin University. Quite grown-up now.

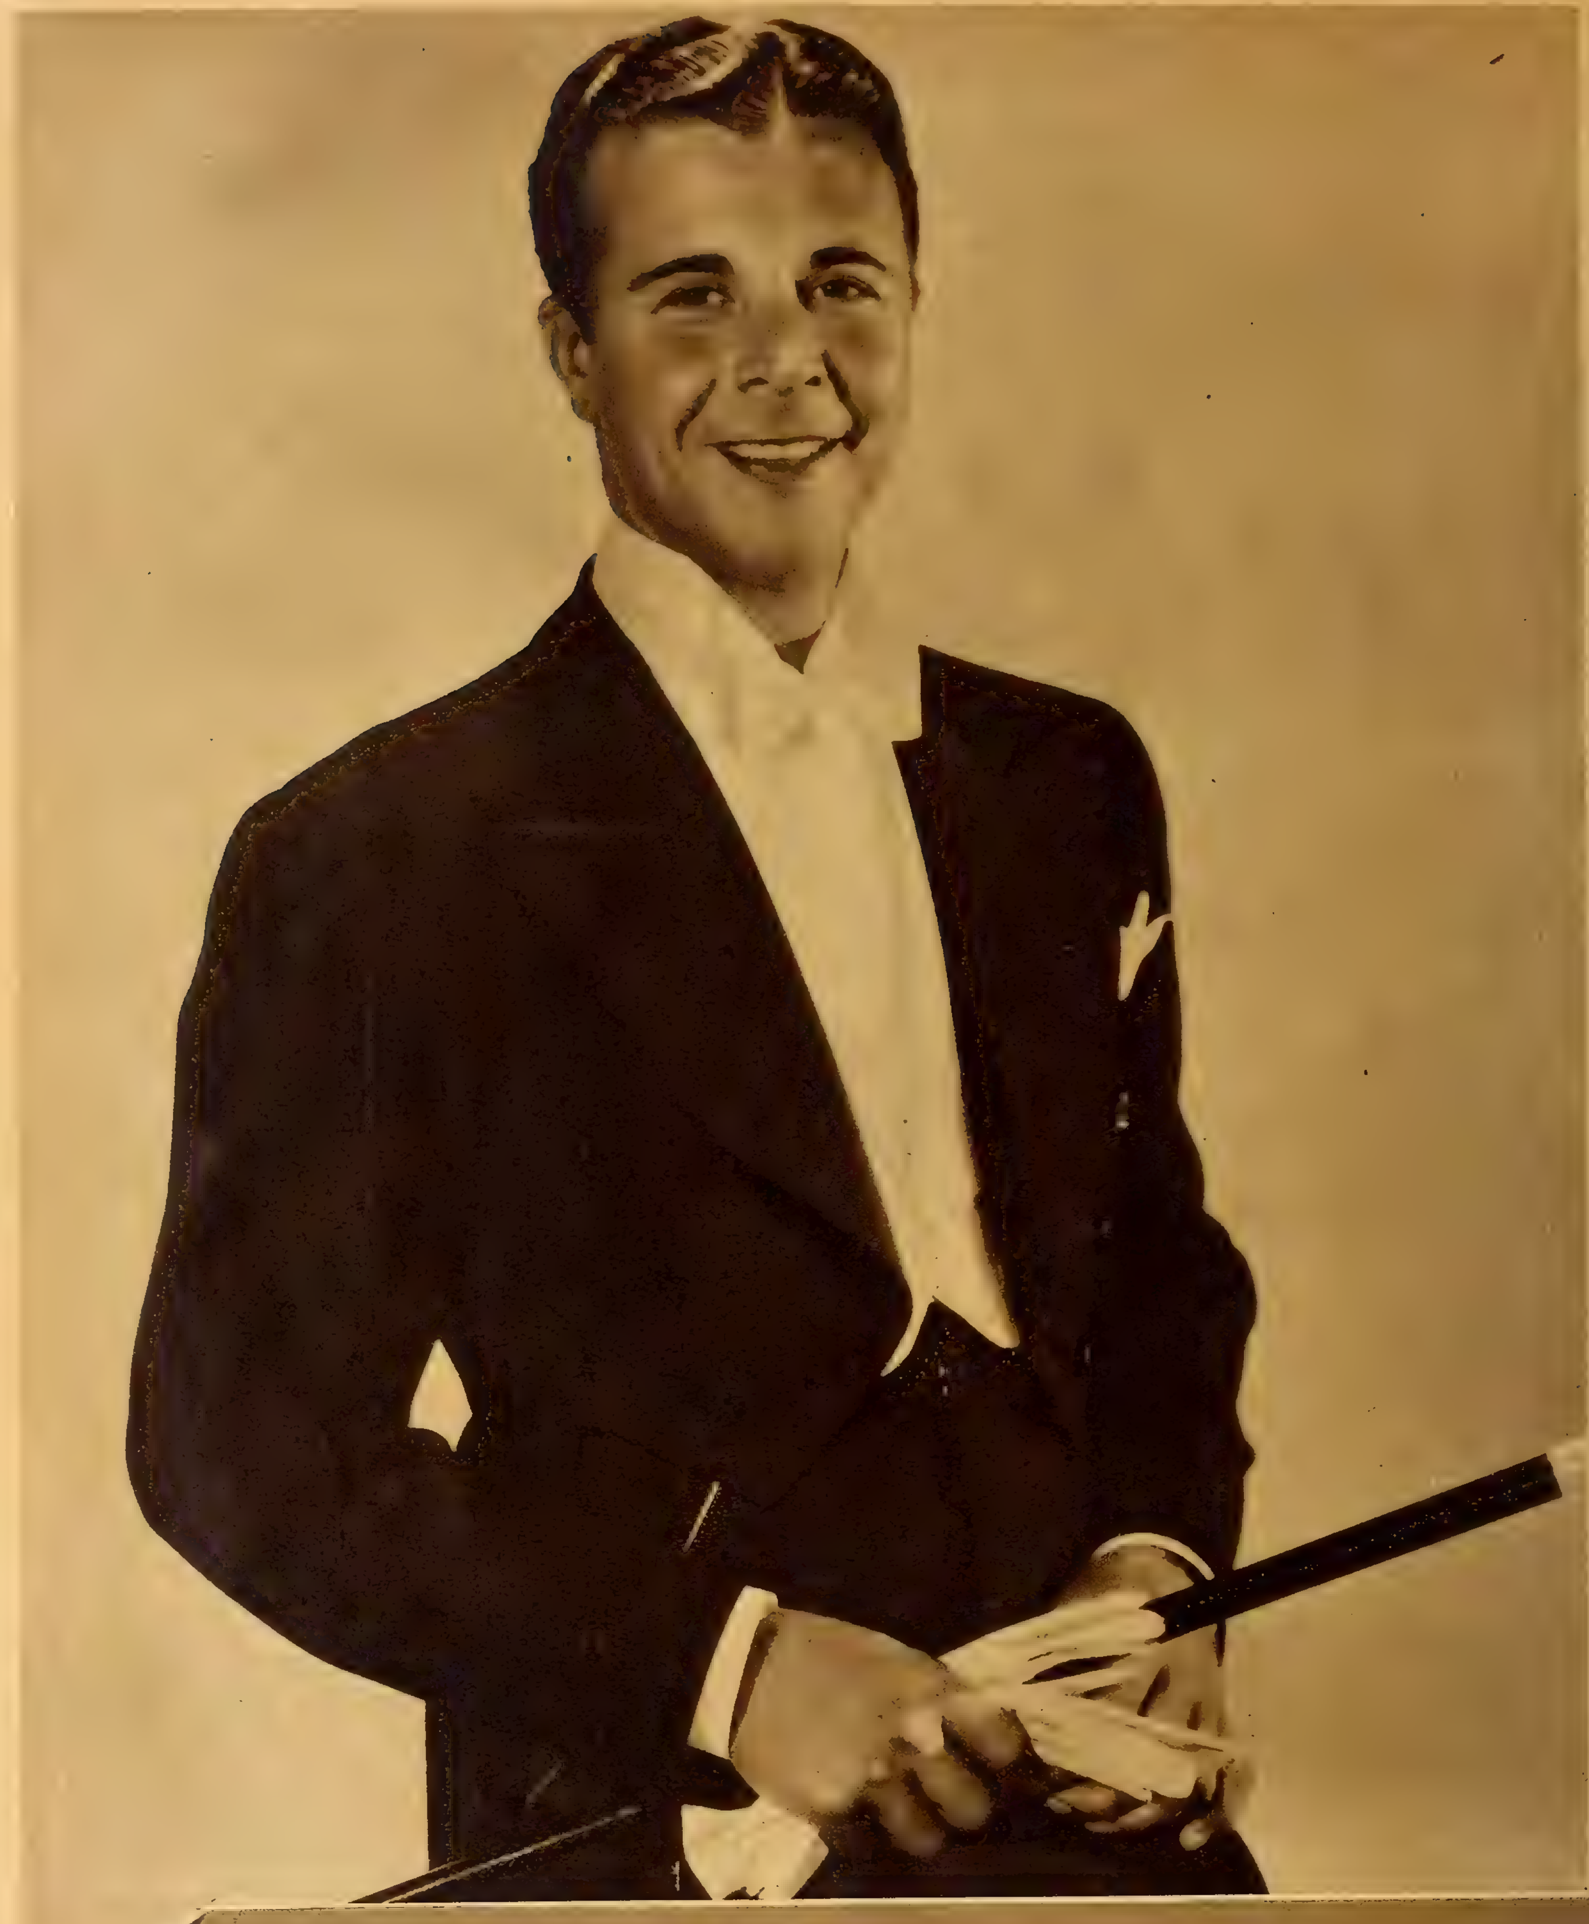
Fred had been slicking the curl out of his hair when he posed for his high school graduation picture.



Mr. MacM., of Hollywood, today. He's to be seen in "Swing High, Swing Low" with Carole Lombard.

Barbara Stanwyck

Dear to the Irish Stanwyck heart was her role in "Plough and the Stars" and such a magnificent job as she did in it! Now she's headed for lighter fare in the screen version of that popular mystery yarn, "Saint in New York." Eduardo Ciannelli plays the clever Saint. By her happy expression here you can tell all's well with Barbara's romantic life. Yes, Bob Taylor's still Head Man.



Dick Powell

How do you like him? Oh, of course, you think he's swell—but we mean about the mustache. This is the way he looks in "On the Avenue" with Madeleine Carroll and also in private life henceforth. It seems that the bride likes him mustache-less, so what can a fellow do? Dick and Joan hurry off most every week-end to Palm Springs for relaxation.

Una Merkel

Wanted: A good, meaty part for one of Hollywood's ablest comediennes. The Merkel brand of fun is very special—part accent and part an intuitive flair for putting herself across. Added up it makes for fan entertainment plus, and they love her. Una's in "One in a Million," the Sonja Henie debut picture with Don Ameche. You saw her in "Born to Dance," of course

Doris Nolan

"Top of the Town" is Doris Nolan's newest picture title and it's a rather apt one for her, too! This attractive blonde actress has proved she is good and her studio is busy casting her for new roles to bring her to fan attention. Completing that, she's working on the provocatively named "As Good as Married," with "St. Moritz" in the offing, too—all for Universal.

If you became a famous cinema celebrity, would your mother tell all about you? This star's does

My Daughter, MYRNA LOY

By Della Williams

As told to Ben Maddox

Your favorite husband-and-wife team, Myrna Loy and William Powell, reel off more sense and nonsense in "After the Thin Man."

I HAVE NEVER discussed my daughter for publication before. I don't want to be bold. I've no secret desire to intrude on her popularity, to steal even a little of her spotlight. Yet, I should like to tell her distant friends, those people who go to see her pictures, some important things about her.

Since she's attained a measure of success, a lot of stories have been written about Myrna. Regularly, writers attempt to interpret her and, often, I'm amazed at their misconceptions, their inability to reveal her as she is. So, perhaps, I shall be pardoned for talking about her myself.

I don't have to guess what her ideas on love are. I know why she waited until last year to marry. I know the right answers to her attitude towards Hollywood and its ways, how she spends her money and what she wants from life, her manner of choosing her wardrobe and the kind of person who intrigues her.

First of all, I'd better explain that when Myrna went into the movies I didn't lose her. It didn't mean that she was entering a fantastic atmosphere where there were strange situations and a set of companions whom I didn't understand. I didn't follow Myrna around, sit on her sets, and attempt to rule her. I had absolute faith in her ability to take care of herself. Still, I've seen as much of her as I would have even though she hadn't become an actress. I'm sure we're closer, for she's had to face more dilemmas, naturally, and she has always brought these problems home. She has confided her troubles to me, as well as shared her joys. Myrna has neither pulled the wool over my eyes nor forgotten me.

Just because she is a screen star, I haven't developed into one of those egotistical, doting mothers who fancies her offspring as being far above everyday living. I have a daughter and a son and I love them more than any other two people in this world. When they're happy, I'm happy. Their thrills are mine, too.

Sometimes I've wanted to shout aloud my pride in Myrna. Yet I haven't been confused by her publicity. I know that she never was the exotic creature folks imagined her to be when she was typed in colorful, half-caste roles. I'm just as positive today that she isn't extraordinarily glamorous in reality.

I hope it won't be disillusioning if I say that Myrna, away from the studio, is completely unaffected; that at home you'd find her no different from the average girl. She is, in fact, a modern home girl! She isn't blasé, temperamental, or peculiar in her habits. She simply doesn't bother to pose. Her tastes aren't astounding. She isn't the sort to let herself go in a spectacular way. So the writers who meet her, accustomed to headline behavior, I suppose, presume she is hiding her real self and proceed to unveil the woman behind the mask.

If the stories you've read about Myrna Loy have confused you—as they have her own mother—read one which gives you the true facts, told by the only person who really knows them—her mother.

I let her select pictures for a career and I have always been so glad I did. Hollywood hasn't changed her. It hasn't hurt her or made her cynical. Rather, it's made Myrna a happy soul and I've never felt any pangs of regret over my decision. Myrna was never a headstrong girl. She sought my permission, and, in giving it, I embraced a distinct responsibility, for if her father had lived, I doubt very much if she'd have had this life she adores.

He came from one of the pioneer families in Montana and he was old-fashioned about women and careers. To our great sorrow, he was taken from us in an influenza epidemic, when Myrna was thirteen. I remembered his decided viewpoint, of course. But I had studied the piano myself. I had been ambitious to become a concert pianist, but I had had to abandon all thoughts of realizing that ambition when I married. (Continued on page 105)

WITH THANKS TO BROADWAY, N.Y.

Hollywood turned

IN MAY, 1914, when war rumblings in Europe were getting louder and louder, and D. W. Griffith was sitting under a tree in his California studio rehearsing Lillian Gish, Mae Marsh, Henry B. Walthall, Wallace Reid and Bobbie Harron in "The Birth of a Nation," an important bit of blessed eventing was going on in Cincinnati, Ohio, and the stork left Tyrone, Junior, with his parents, Tyrone and Patia Power.

Twenty years later Broadway did a notable bit of research work for Hollywood and discovered Tyrone, Jr., who, since his outstanding work in "Lloyds of London," has the feminine fans sighing and the hard-boiled critics proclaiming that he is the screen "find" of the year. Even the less enthusiastic critics admit he has just about everything it takes to develop from a screen "find" to a screen idol.

Yet, three years ago Hollywood literally turned its back on the young actor, refused to give him the slightest encouragement and forced him to go to Broadway for recognition.

HOLLYWOOD is full of Juniors, who invariably find their famous names a handicap. Tyrone, too, found his family name his greatest obstacle, both in Hollywood and New York. He found it difficult to establish himself as an actor and a personality; to make people forget his name and to prove that he was not just an actor's son. His grim fight to do this entailed disappointments, discouragements and even hardships.

Because of his fine performance in "Lloyds of London," Tyrone Power is "co-starred" with Loretta Young in "Love Is News."

Tyrone Power down once, but they're glad to have him now!

On the Power family crest—the family really has a coat of arms—is the motto: "Through cross to crown."

That inscription was a little too prophetic to suit Tyrone at times when he "met all the crosses and there wasn't a crown in sight." But now that it is all over—he has a seven-year starring contract with Twentieth Century-Fox—he is of the opinion that nothing worth while is ever gained without hard work and some sacrifice.

His father, the late Tyrone Power, needs no introduction here, for he was one of the most famous actors in theatrical history. His mother, Patia, who now lives in Hollywood with her son, is beautiful, talented, and is well-known on the stage and radio and also as a dramatic teacher. Tyrone's grandfather, Harold Power, was one of England's famous concert pianists. For generations the name Power has stood for fame and accomplishment in Ireland, England, France and America.

WITH SUCH blood in his veins, there would be more to wonder at if this handsome, brown-eyed chap had not inherited great talent. His great-grandfather, Tyrone Power, was named after County Tyrone, and our hero is Tyrone III, but he pronounces his name Ty*rone* and not *Ty*rone, as his father was called. Accent on the second syllable, pulleze, "because I like it that way," he explains.

During his early childhood, his parents were working alternately in pictures and on the New York stage, and at the age of seven, Tyrone, Jr., made his debut playing a small role in the Mission Play, at the Mission Theatre in San Gabriel, California.

When he was nine years old he returned to Cincinnati with his mother, who had been engaged to teach voice and dramatic expression at the (Continued on page 94)

Long-distance marriages can be successful even in Hollywood, and Capt. Astley and Madeleine prove it.

Successful in dramatic roles, Madeleine Carroll attempts a musical, "On the Avenue," with Dick Powell.

A SCHOOLMARM LOOKS AT HOLLYWOOD

MADELEINE CARROLL was never to forget her French mother's early teaching. Because of that teaching, she firmly believes, she is in Hollywood today.

Madeleine, her younger sister, her mother, and her mild-mannered, English school teacher father lived in Birmingham, England, in a shabby little house on a decent, shabby little street. The tall, fair, Celtic-looking Madeleine with her lush Latin soul, and the dark Latin-looking young sister with her cool Celtic soul, were beauties with neither "dot" nor dowry. They wore each others' "hand-me-downs." They could not be introduced to society. They could not travel. They were that tragic commonplace of circumstance—beautiful and poor.

Madeleine's shrewd French mother, knowing that only in fiction does the Prince come for Cinderella, knowing that it takes more earthly riches than those of the mind and spirit to give a beautiful daughter her start in life, gave to Madeleine the only heritage which was hers to give. She said, "You start out in life handicapped. You have nothing to help you attain success in any way save one thing: remember, always, to be gracious to everyone. Be gracious to people less important than you, remembering that they may be more important than you tomorrow. This is the way of the world."

"Which may sound," said the ice-blonde Madeleine of the warm voice and the gray, exciting eyes, "commercial. It was, actually, the perfect instance of the good, French bourgeois common sense; the practical common sense of the French mother who sees to it that her daughter has the proper 'dot' and is well established in life. It was, also, although we didn't know it then, of course, a prescient echo of the current Hollywood axiom which says, 'Always be nice to the office boy, he may be a producer tomorrow!'

"It was the only 'dot' my mother had to give me. I had sense enough to take it, gratefully and believingly. She spoke, too, of my maternal grandmother and great-grandmother, telling me how beautiful, gracious and charming they were. I bent over backwards in my effort to be nice and gracious to everyone, to little waitresses in coffee shops, to conductors on trains, to neighbors, friends, everyone. I learned to be gracious to people I didn't feel like being gracious to. A valuable lesson. If you practice it long enough it becomes natural. I may even have been a little sickening," she laughed, "I was so very gracious to the world and his wife. Just the same, I realize now, as I realized then, that my mother was giving me the only heritage she had to give and that it would stand me in very good stead.

I KNEW, even as a child, that I didn't want to be a school teacher. It was my father's wish. I didn't want to pass on, secondhand, the knowledge others had gained. I didn't want to hand down a lighted torch. I wanted to be the lighted torch.

"I wanted to obtain a position as secretary to a diplomat. I hoped, eventually, to have my hand in the weaving of the web of world politics (Continued on page 118)

And in giving it the once-over, Madeleine Carroll lets you in on its surprises

A recent portrait of the British girl who has always gotten what she wanted. Her secret? She tells it to you in this article.

Have you, out of your crowded life, one incident you'd like to forget? So have these stars!

How would you like to go up in a swing? Janet Gaynor wouldn't!

THE THINGS THEY WANT TO FORGET

By Dora Albert

There's that little fly-swallowing routine that Warner Baxter would like to skip.

IF ONLY I could forget—"

How many times have your lips silently formed those words? How many times has the desire to forget welled up into your heart? If you knew that you could forget one thing and only one, what would you chose to forget?

When I asked a group of movie stars that question, their eyes widened in surprise, almost shock. Their faces changed, their masks dropped. I saw them remembering things that had tortured them, memories that had changed them, events that had embittered and embarrassed them.

If she lives to be a hundred, Irene Dunne will never forget her burning humiliation the day she was crowned Queen of Beauty in Panama. She had on a beautiful champagne taffeta dress with a long train, which she wore at the coronation festival that night. And very regal she looked as she sat facing the glittering assemblage. Suddenly a young man dashed up to her. Perhaps it was his intention to ask her to dance. At any rate, he stepped on the train of her dress. Zip—went the gown. Its entire back was torn out, leaving Irene standing there in her panties!

The crowd gasped. They began to whisper among themselves. And the man who was the cause of it all began to mumble futile apologies.

To Irene Dunne the whole thing had the horror and incredibility of a nightmare. This thing couldn't be happening to her. It couldn't. It was like one of those fantastic dreams in which people imagine themselves on Fifth Avenue in New York without any clothes on.

While the crowd gaped, she was rushed to a dressing-room, where she changed her dress. But the rest of that evening she couldn't bear to face anyone, for the memory of what had happened was like a vivid tangible thing making a ghastly mockery of all the festivities preceding it.

Bing Crosby blames no one but himself for the one thing in his life he'd like to forget. We all have our own codes of conduct, and when we deviate from them, we feel as if we'd betrayed ourselves. Many years ago Bing ran away from his home in Spokane, determined to make his own way in the world. He would stand on his own two feet, demanding help from no one, especially his family.

Bing got as far as Weed, California. Then he found he couldn't get work. He had no money left. Tired, discouraged and hungry, he wired to his brother in Portland, for money, thus breaking the promise he had made to himself.

Not for a moment has Bing ever regretted or been ashamed of running away from home, but it is with bitterness that he remembers that he lost his nerve and had to holler for help.

There is only one incident that happened in his life that Bert Wheeler, of the Wheeler and Woolsey team, wants to forget. Once he tried to help a man find redemption, tried to cure him of the craving for drink which had ruined this man's career. But he failed miserably.

Twelve years ago he was appearing at the Palace Theatre in New York. When his act ended, he walked out toward the stage door. In the alley, standing in the snow, he saw a man whose face was lined with care, who rushed up to him and said, "Bert, you must help me!"

Bert stared at this stranger. And then his horrified eyes took in the fact that this man in shabby, torn clothes was no stranger. He was an old friend of Bert's family, whom Bert had known many years ago, when he was a youngster filled with dreams and ambitions. Bert gulped. His throat felt painfully constricted.

"I'll help you," he said, his voice awed. "Come home with me." And he rushed his old friend into a taxi and took him home, where he kept him for a week. In that week it became evident to him why the boy had grown into this shabby, ill-kempt man. It became evident that this man was drinking too much, that he was, in fact, on the verge of delirium tremens.

He made up his mind that he would try to cure him. For some time he helped him financially. Then in order to bolster up the man's self-respect, he got him a job. And he encouraged the man to visit him at the studio frequently so that he could help him.

Friends who saw what Bert was doing begged him to stop, for his own peace of mind. Bert closed his ears to their advice, their pleas. His friend had promised to behave. That was enough for him.

The friend broke his promise. He couldn't seem to help himself. The craving that was stronger than he rushed back upon him time and again. Each time Bert came forward to help him, hoping that this time would be the last.

Finally he realized it was (Continued on page 121)

NOT TO BE IGNORED

Lots of eyes, mouth and mama— that's Martha (Yeah Man) Raye

There was a time when Martha signed for nothing but an upper berth on the next train to New York. Now she has a five-year movie contract.

An evening at home is Martha Raye's idea of a total loss, so fiance Jerry Hopper takes her to the Grove on date night.

By Ruth Rankin

MARTHA RAYE has the prettiest legs in Hollywood. "God's compensation for a face like mine," Martha explains, making a snout to stop a clock.

The face doesn't, however, stop cameras. They have kept grinding almost continuously since this little Raye of moonshine hit Hollywood five months ago, until by this time she has four pictures in the bag: "Rhythm on the Range," "The Big Broadcast of 1937," "Hideaway Girl" and "College Holiday." And more coming up, if her wind holds out, for at least five years are signed for.

But it was not always thus. There was a time, quite recently, when Martha was signed for nothing at all except possibly an upper berth on the next train to New York.

"Yeah man, but I was in a spot." Martha contracts her rubber face to half size and things begin to look pretty serious. "The heads that were shaking the wrong way when I was making 'Rhythm' stirred up quite a breeze. Every time they came out from looking over the day's rushes, their faces fell down to the curb. They said I was 'too broad'—and they didn't mean my shape, either.

"But I had three friends, and when you come to think of it that's a lot of friends to have in one town—Director Norman Taurog, who spotted me putting on my act at the Trocadero one night, Bing Crosby and Bob Burns. They patted me on the back till their hands blistered. 'You're all right, kid. Don't pull your shots,' they said. Norman was particularly solicitous because he was the director, it was his picture, he gave me the part—and he was going to be in the rough, (Continued on page 125)

MAN OF THE AUER

Mischa Auer, the screen's newest funnyman, now gives you his version of "Hamlet." "Top of the Town's" the picture.

By Dorothy Spensley

Mischa steals a scene a minute, but there's not a star who resents it

TO MISCHA AUER, sad-eyed, thirty-one, a Russian refugee, tragedy is the cause of his riotous screen humor. Victim of a bloody era, orphaned at fourteen, his film antics are the results of his deliberate efforts to forget the tragedy his youthful eyes beheld.

If you roared with laughter at his ape-like buffooneries in that crazy sequence in "My Man Godfrey," rolled in the aisles at his satiric portrayal of the stoic Indian in "The Gay Desperado," remember that the excellent humor of this fellow stems from a deliberate effort to stamp out the horror-memories of his youth.

"America, too, is responsible for the kind of comedy I am now doing," says this foreign-born humorist. "The humor of America is built mostly on ridicule. You ridicule customs, institutions, people, politics, national worries. It's a great idea, because, in the case of troubles and worries, their tragic proportions are reduced by satiric attacks.

"When I came to New York sixteen years ago my attitude was typically Russian, morose. The things that I had seen in my fifteen years had naturally served to make me serious, old in mind, unable to see any humor in life. Starvation, death, the overturning of an ancient regime—I had watched and experienced all these things.

"In America, I soon saw, no one starved. There was security. That, to me, is the most vital thing in life. There was no danger of death by political intrigue. Anyone could get enough to wear. From a tense, undernourished boy—I was only five feet tall when I was fifteen; as the result of food and care, after that age, I shot up to my present six feet two inches—I became relaxed, anxious to absorb the spirit of this new country.

"I soon realized that Americans don't nurse old grudges—generally speaking. This was

THERE'S A MR. X IN SYLVIA'S LIFE

His influence has brought both happiness and fame to this star

THE DEVOTION of a mysterious man as far back as the early teen era in Sylvia Sidney's successful career was, at first, the motivating force and later the dominant inspiration for this diminutive star's struggle to acting fame. The Mr. X in her life is no histrionic Romeo nor is he a power-wielding executive. In recent years their paths have turned widely apart. But so vital has been the effect of an adolescent association and so constant the guiding encouragement each has given the other's ambitions that even now, separated by a continent and belonging to alien worlds, they still definitely intrude their own activities into the other's realm of interests.

Today, Sylvia Sidney has arrived in the first ranks of a profession where she's constantly in the limelight. Mr. X has buried himself in medical research where a self-effacing attitude is necessary to achievement. His contributions to his work have been as important and satisfying as Sylvia's to hers. She is a celebrity and he is a scientist. Publicity is her necessity, but it would certainly be detrimental to his job if even his name were mentioned with a Hollywood star's. For, he is allied with the biggest medical research foundation in America.

He buries himself in a New York laboratory where he experiments on animals with obscure diseases, while she receives the plaudits of a world. But these varied careers go back to closely bound beginnings, when bright futures were vague hopes and the ambitions of a boy and girl were still two youthful dreams. The result is that the scientist talks authoritatively in terms of the theatre and screen, while Sylvia understands more about science than any other woman in all Hollywood.

Into the lonely New York childhood of Sylvia Sidney came an English cousin. He had problems of his own to carry into the new country he was to make his permanent home. He was four years older than Sylvia, slim, wavy-haired, soft-eyed; and, like Sylvia, without companions of his own age. He thought of her as a baby with visions beyond her years, but he respected her dreams and he helped to make them realities.

HE THOUGHT I was a brat," Sylvia says now with a laugh. And a tolerant, understanding look comes into his deep eyes as he admits, "She was temperamental and moody, subject to great depression—a child who had no friends and apparently didn't need them. But she had a confirmed belief in herself as a future actress and I realized she had the talent."

Sylvia certainly did so much about her childish plans that, at twelve years of age, she gave a two-hour program, all by herself, at the Little Theatre. At sixteen she was playing ingenue leads in New York stage productions.

But, before the debut and prior to her footlight engagements, there were seasons when she alternated between a complete belief that the years would bring her what she wanted, and those dark moments when everything seemed impossible.

It was during this time that the devoted cousin, occupied with his medical studies, gave to Sylvia the incentive she needed. He encouraged her, helped her with her parts and sympathized with her ambitions. And she, in return, took a keen interest in his work. She read medical books and studied the papers he prepared and so spurred him by her faith in him.

THEY BOTH knew what they wanted, and happily enough, they got it. He recalls the many hours when she rehearsed in her home—he says she was always acting—and it was his job to cue her and to play the masculine parts to feminine characterizations which then seemed too mature for her. She had a (Continued on page 123)

HE HAS

By Franc Dillon

Ian Hunter's been in pictures for over two years yet most of the screen colony doesn't know him. He's that elusive!

Whether they know him or not, people refer to Ian as a "grand fellow." Here he is with Kay Francis in "Stolen Holiday."

Will Ian Hunter's Garbo-ing continue now that you fans are pushing him starward?

A private life

AS I turned a corner around one of the huge studio sound stages, I almost stumbled over Warner Baxter, who was sitting on the step outside the door, his head in his hands.

"Headache or hangover or both?" I wondered.

He looked up with a distressed expression.

"No headache," he said, "but I just had to sock the grandest guy in the face and I feel terrible.

"I don't know why," Warner continued, "but it always gets me to have to hit anyone in a picture, especially a nice chap like Ian Hunter. You know, he's swell and he's a stranger here and, well—I guess it's all a little silly." And he grinned sheepishly.

When I thought it over it struck me as funny that he had referred to Ian Hunter, who has been in Hollywood making pictures for almost two years, as a "stranger." My curiosity was aroused and I recalled that, although I had enjoyed his work in pictures very much, I had never heard a word about him personally. I tried to recall having seen him at even one Hollywood social affair. Surely a person, described as Warner had spoken of him, couldn't avoid being popular. And so I went sleuthing out to the studio where he was working with Kay Francis again in "Stolen Holiday" to find out why Mr. Hunter is a stranger in Hollywood.

In a town where you call a person by his first name after the first meeting, two years' residence here should have made him an old settler. But I learned that even at his own studio, he is the man nobody knows.

At my first inquiry in the publicity department I was told:

"He's a grand fellow but we don't know him. Would you like to have lunch with him?"

Of course I would. As I waited for him to arrive in the Green Room, I was a trifle nervous. What would I talk to him about if he were such a shy person that no one in his own publicity department knew him—the department that sees all, knows all and never sleeps?

And then he came in, apologizing for having kept me waiting. It seemed that an army of ants had taken possession of his dressing room—"and some of them got in my trousers," he said slyly.

I breathed a sigh of relief. At least he had a sense of humor.

IT OCCURS to me now that Mr. Hunter may be quite surprised to find himself referred to as a man nobody knows and probably he will think it quite an inaccurate description. Certainly he is friendly, charming and took great pains to please an inquiring reporter. But after an hour's intensive probing, in an effort to learn something about the man, I found myself about where I had started.

Affable, interesting, well informed and intelligent, he talked of everything under the (Continued or page 87)

Last year Frances took your movie tickets, but today—

THE FARMER TAKES THE SHOW

By Lois Svensrud

I'VE ALWAYS gone my own way and I intend to stick to that route. What's more I'll stick to my seven-year-old car, my last year's clothes and my this year's husband. I won't go Hollywood."

And Frances Farmer gave an emphatic tug to what was obviously last year's hat.

"I'm not a glamor girl. I don't feel a bit more alluring as a movie actress than I did as a movie usher, so why act overtime like most of these people in Hollywood do? They call me 'different' around here because I want to be myself. Well, I was considered a freak at college and a bad girl at high school for the same reason, so it's nothing new."

There was no defiance in Frances' manner; she was simply matter-of-fact. And that is typical of the way this girl has taken Hollywood by storm. Frances' movie experience on her arrival in Hollywood a year ago had been limited to ushering people up and down the aisles of the Paramount Theatre in Seattle. And a few months later she had hard-boiled Hollywood gasping in amazement over her dual character portrayal in "Come and Get It."

Twenty-one, slender and blonde, you'd spot Frances Farmer as the sweet young thing. But that would be before those direct hazel eyes were levelled on you and before you had noted the strength in every line of her beautifully chiselled face. And particularly before you saw her hands. Frances had her chin cupped in them now as she leaned towards us over the luncheon table. Sturdy, square hands they were, devoid of a single ring or a hint of polish. As plainly as though Frances had spoken, those hands said, "There's no sham about us. We've worked hard. We're not afraid or ashamed of it."

Top, Frances and Leif Erikson, her actor-hubby, and below, with Edward Arnold in "Come and Get It."

They called Frances Farmer a bad girl at high school, a freak at college and "different" at the studio. But, she's the tops!

"I guess being broke half my life has a lot to do with not being over-awed by Hollywood," she continued thoughtfully. "After all, when you've waited on table, washed mountains of dishes, worked in factories and taken care of other people's children to be sure where your next meal is coming from, no job could look glamorous."

For four years Frances took these jobs in order to get enough money to attend the University of Washington. She worked in the school cafeteria during lunch hours, was an usherette at thirty-six cents an hour during the evening, typed nine hours a week under the NRA Students' Relief Fund for the magnificent sum of fifteen dollars a month, and worked in a dye factory, and during vacations took a variety of jobs that would give her the money to return to school in the fall.

"These were really the jobs that undermined my morale," she told us. "For instance, one summer I spent as counsellor to a group of Campfire girls at Puget Sound. I used to feel that if I saw another bloomer girl, I'd commit hari kari right in front of the evening campfire. Besides that, I'd just started smoking, so I had to take long hikes into the woods for a puff or two. They thought I was such a nature lover!

THEN there was the summer I worked at Mt. Rainier. My duties there were to wait on the table and help with the entertainment in the evening. Juggling trays was nothing compared to getting dressed up every evening in gunny-sacks and singing 'Pale Moon' like a love-sick Indian maiden."

GOOD BAD

LLOYD NOLAN may not "do a Clark Gable," but—he may "do" a William Powell or James Cagney or George Raft.

Not one of them won his first screen contract because he was handsome. Yet today all four are among the most popular men on the screen.

Each of them had an individual, interesting face. Each of them had some basic likeability that shone through the most dislikeable characters he played.

And that's the way it is with Lloyd.

He isn't handsome in the matinee idol manner. He says himself that if he had to depend on his appearance, he "wouldn't get very far."

In "The Texas Rangers," he played a notorious bad man of the old West—a character capable of murdering Jack Oakie in cold blood, with a smile.

Yet you couldn't help feeling attracted to him. He was human, underneath his cold-bloodedness. He was interesting, exciting, colorful. He made you want to see more of him and his smile, hear more of his unusual voice.

And you will see—and hear—more of him. Plenty more. Paramount has signed him not only to a seven-year contract, but to a phenomenal one. He won't face a single option in the first three years!

It's the first such contract ever given to a comparative newcomer. That's how much the studio thinks of the possibilities of young Mr. Nolan.

And who is he? Where did he come from? What has he done?

Off the screen, as on, he is quiet-spoken, deliberate, frank. His brown eyes are "on the level" with you. There is a smile in them.

One thing he smiles about is your surprise at the color of his hair. On the screen, it looks vaguely blond. Actually, it is grayish. It has been that way since he was nineteen. It's a family characteristic. His mother, brother and sister all acquired grayish hair in their teens.

HE WAS born in San Francisco, where his father was a shoe manufacturer—one of the firm of Nolan Brothers, which had a death grip on the local shoe industry.

It was such a good business that it's a wonder Lloyd didn't go into it.

"My elder brother did," he said. "And finally got out of it and into merchandising. But I never wanted any part of it, myself. I didn't know what I did want, except acting and that sounded like a hazardous, precarious business." Amusedly, he added, "Maybe that was why I chose it.

"My mother had been interested in theatricals as a young girl. She was rather sympathetic to my leanings. She would take me, as a (Continued on page 90)

DON'T TALK ABOUT IT- DO IT!

Is tomorrow the day you're going to diet and exercise? Why not do it today?

By Mary Marshall

IS IT too late to mention New Year's resolutions? No! All right. And if the subject isn't too, too boring, I'd like to urge you all to make some good resolutions about yourselves—about taking care of your faces and your figures. Of course, there's no good reason why we should wait for the turn of the year to make good resolutions, but most of us do wait, and it does somehow give a spurt to the will power to start out fresh with New Year's Day. The spurt is fine—but how about keeping the resolutions you make? Around and about that little matter, I want to say a few well chosen words.

Don't "resolve" too much. Don't make things too hard for yourself. You know how it is: you say, "The first of the year, I'm going on a diet." And you go on such a rigid diet—right bang off the first day—that the strongest will power would crumble under it. You say, "The first of the year, I'm going to start exercising—really!" And you go at it like a football star in training—for three days, at the end of which time, your poor, bruised and aching bones just naturally quit on you. You say, "The first of the year, I'm really going to brush my hair and massage my scalp—and never go to bed without cleansing my face—and give my nails regular attention—and hold my stomach in all the time—and give up cigarettes and cocktails."

While you're in the resolution-making mood, you vow a staunch vow to turn out all the cupboards in the house, finish "Anthony Adverse," keep up with current events, go to church regularly—in short, you're going to make yourself over completely, according to New Year's Resolutions One to Twenty-six. And what happens? You have a dandy time talking about what you're going to do. If you don't actually gas over the "I'm-going-to's" with someone else, you enjoy patting yourself on the back, mentally. And, come February first, you've slid right back into your old sinful ways. Let's not have that happen again—how about it?

INSTEAD, pick out the one or two or three things about yourself that you know in your soul you can improve if you really concentrate. You have this much time, and that much money to spend on yourself, and these certain responsibilities to attend to. You can't do everything, all at once. Budget your beauty time. Put self-improvement on a schedule. And stick to the budget and the schedule!

In this lecture, Teacher would like to ramble around on five general topics: losing and gaining weight; the improvement, care and glorification of your skins; general grooming, and how to take the greatest advantage of the least time and the skinniest pocketbook; and what, for lack of a better term, I'll call "personality improvement"—wherein I shall come to the five swell looking and diversely typed girls on these two pages.

SHE'S IN DEBT

And what worries Gladys Swarthout most is that she'll never be able to pay off

By Caroline S. Hoyt

I AM in debt," said Gladys Swarthout. "Can you help me, I wonder?"

Gladys Swarthout, her husband, Frank Chapman, and I were sitting in front of the blazing eucalyptus logs in her living room. The silver tea service held the sheen of flame. The charming room with its satiny mahogany, framed photographs, and vases filled with white flowers, was a pool of peacefulness. Gladys wore a tea gown of striped taffeta, rose and gold and blue and cream, buttoned to her throat, prim and stiff. Her thick, dark hair, parted smoothly in the middle, curled about her head. She looked young and soft as she reminisced in the firelight. She looked anything but in distress, in debt.

"Perhaps you can help me to repay them," she continued. I looked at the tip of my shoe and cleared my throat. She said, laughing gently, "Oh, not financial debts. They are the least of all debts. I have repaid them long ago.

"No, I mean debts of the spirit. There are the debts I owe to those who had faith in me, debts I owe to those who gave me inspiration, self-confidence and courage, debts I owe to those who have 'done unto others' and, especially, unto me.

"All of us are simply the sum total of the qualities which have been given to us. I have what vision I have because vision was given to me. I have my courage because I was given the gift of courage. I have a sense of responsibility because another gave it to me. We come into the world pretty naked, you know. And as we go along, we are given the gifts that make us the personalities we become. That is my belief. At least, it is true of me.

Gladys Swarthout and Frank Forest in a scene from "Champagne Waltz," the picture which she hopes will establish her definitely as a top star.

"It is so difficult to repay these debts. About all we can do is to keep them green. So, if you will put into tangible words the intangible spirit of my gratitude, my continuous awareness of my unpaid debts, it would help.

"There are to begin with, of course, my debts to my mother and to my sister, Roma. I owe my ideals to Roma. She gave me my belief in the value of truth. She was a stickler for the truth. She made me realize, in childhood, that lies and evasions are shabby things. She never compromised with life. She set a goal and she went straight to it and didn't whimper if she stumbled and was hurt. She gave me these gifts. I like to think that I have kept them fairly intact. I'll never be able to repay her because, you see, there is nothing of more value which I could give her in return.

"There was Mr. Holmes, the Principal of the high school back home in Kansas City. How well I can see him still, stocky and genial, his personality so definite that you could not help idolizing him. He held an assembly every week where we were called upon to rise in meeting and sing, recite or play the piano. Every week he called upon Roma and me. He never skipped us. I was petrified at first. I'd never thought of getting up on the stage and performing. When first he gave me that thought, I turned to ice. But I did it. I had to.

I owe him the debt, too, of being prepared for emergencies. I owe him, undoubtedly, the debt of my living through my debut at the Metropolitan Opera House. He gave me confidence in myself.

Miss Swarthout smiled over at her husband who, relaxed in his fireside chair, prompted his wife's memory now and again. He said, "Gladys forgets things when she is talking about herself."

"Then," said Gladys, "there was my first voice teacher, Belle Vickers. She was a coloratura soprano, a concert singer. She was terribly ambitious for Roma and me. She was ambitious for us beyond our equipment, our background, our years. She always called me little 'Mimi'. She was the first to insist that I should be a 'Butterfly.' She gave me a vision of what I might do if I wanted to, what I might be if I cared enough. She was the first to suggest that I might do opera—I, who had aspired to nothing beyond (Continued on page 115)

You can do with only one silk dress a season if that one is cut simply like Elissa Landi's and is made of a fine, unusual fabric.

You can buy smartness at bargain prices, if you'll just learn the trick of juggling your costumes and accessories with variety

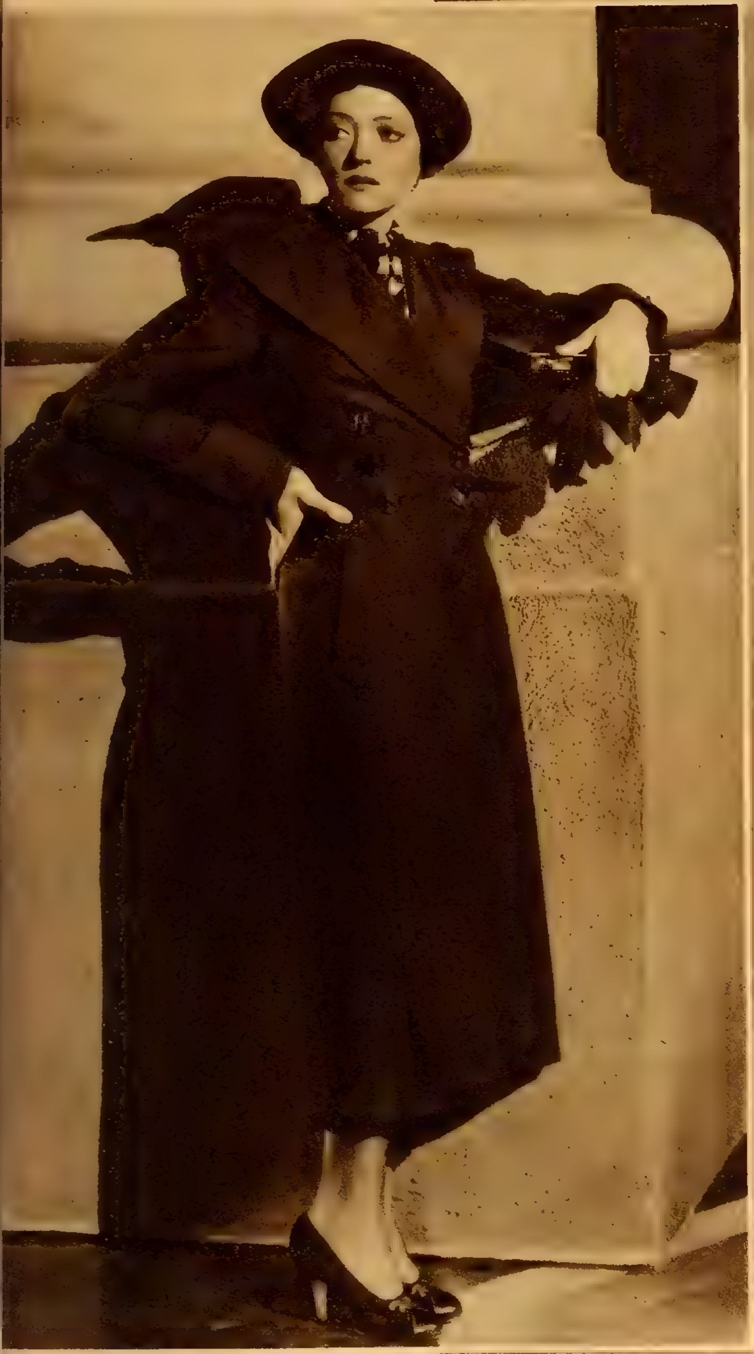
POLITICIANS LOVE to harangue about balancing the nation's budget, but none has ever contributed much constructive thought as to how an individual can balance his or hers! As far as we are concerned the budget we are most interested in balancing is our clothes one. It's easy enough to generalize about dressing smartly on next to nothing, but it's not so easy to show specifically how it can be done. For instance, how would you select four basic costumes that would see you through fall, winter and spring? I purposely omit summer because it is the one season in the year when clothes expenditures can be the lightest.

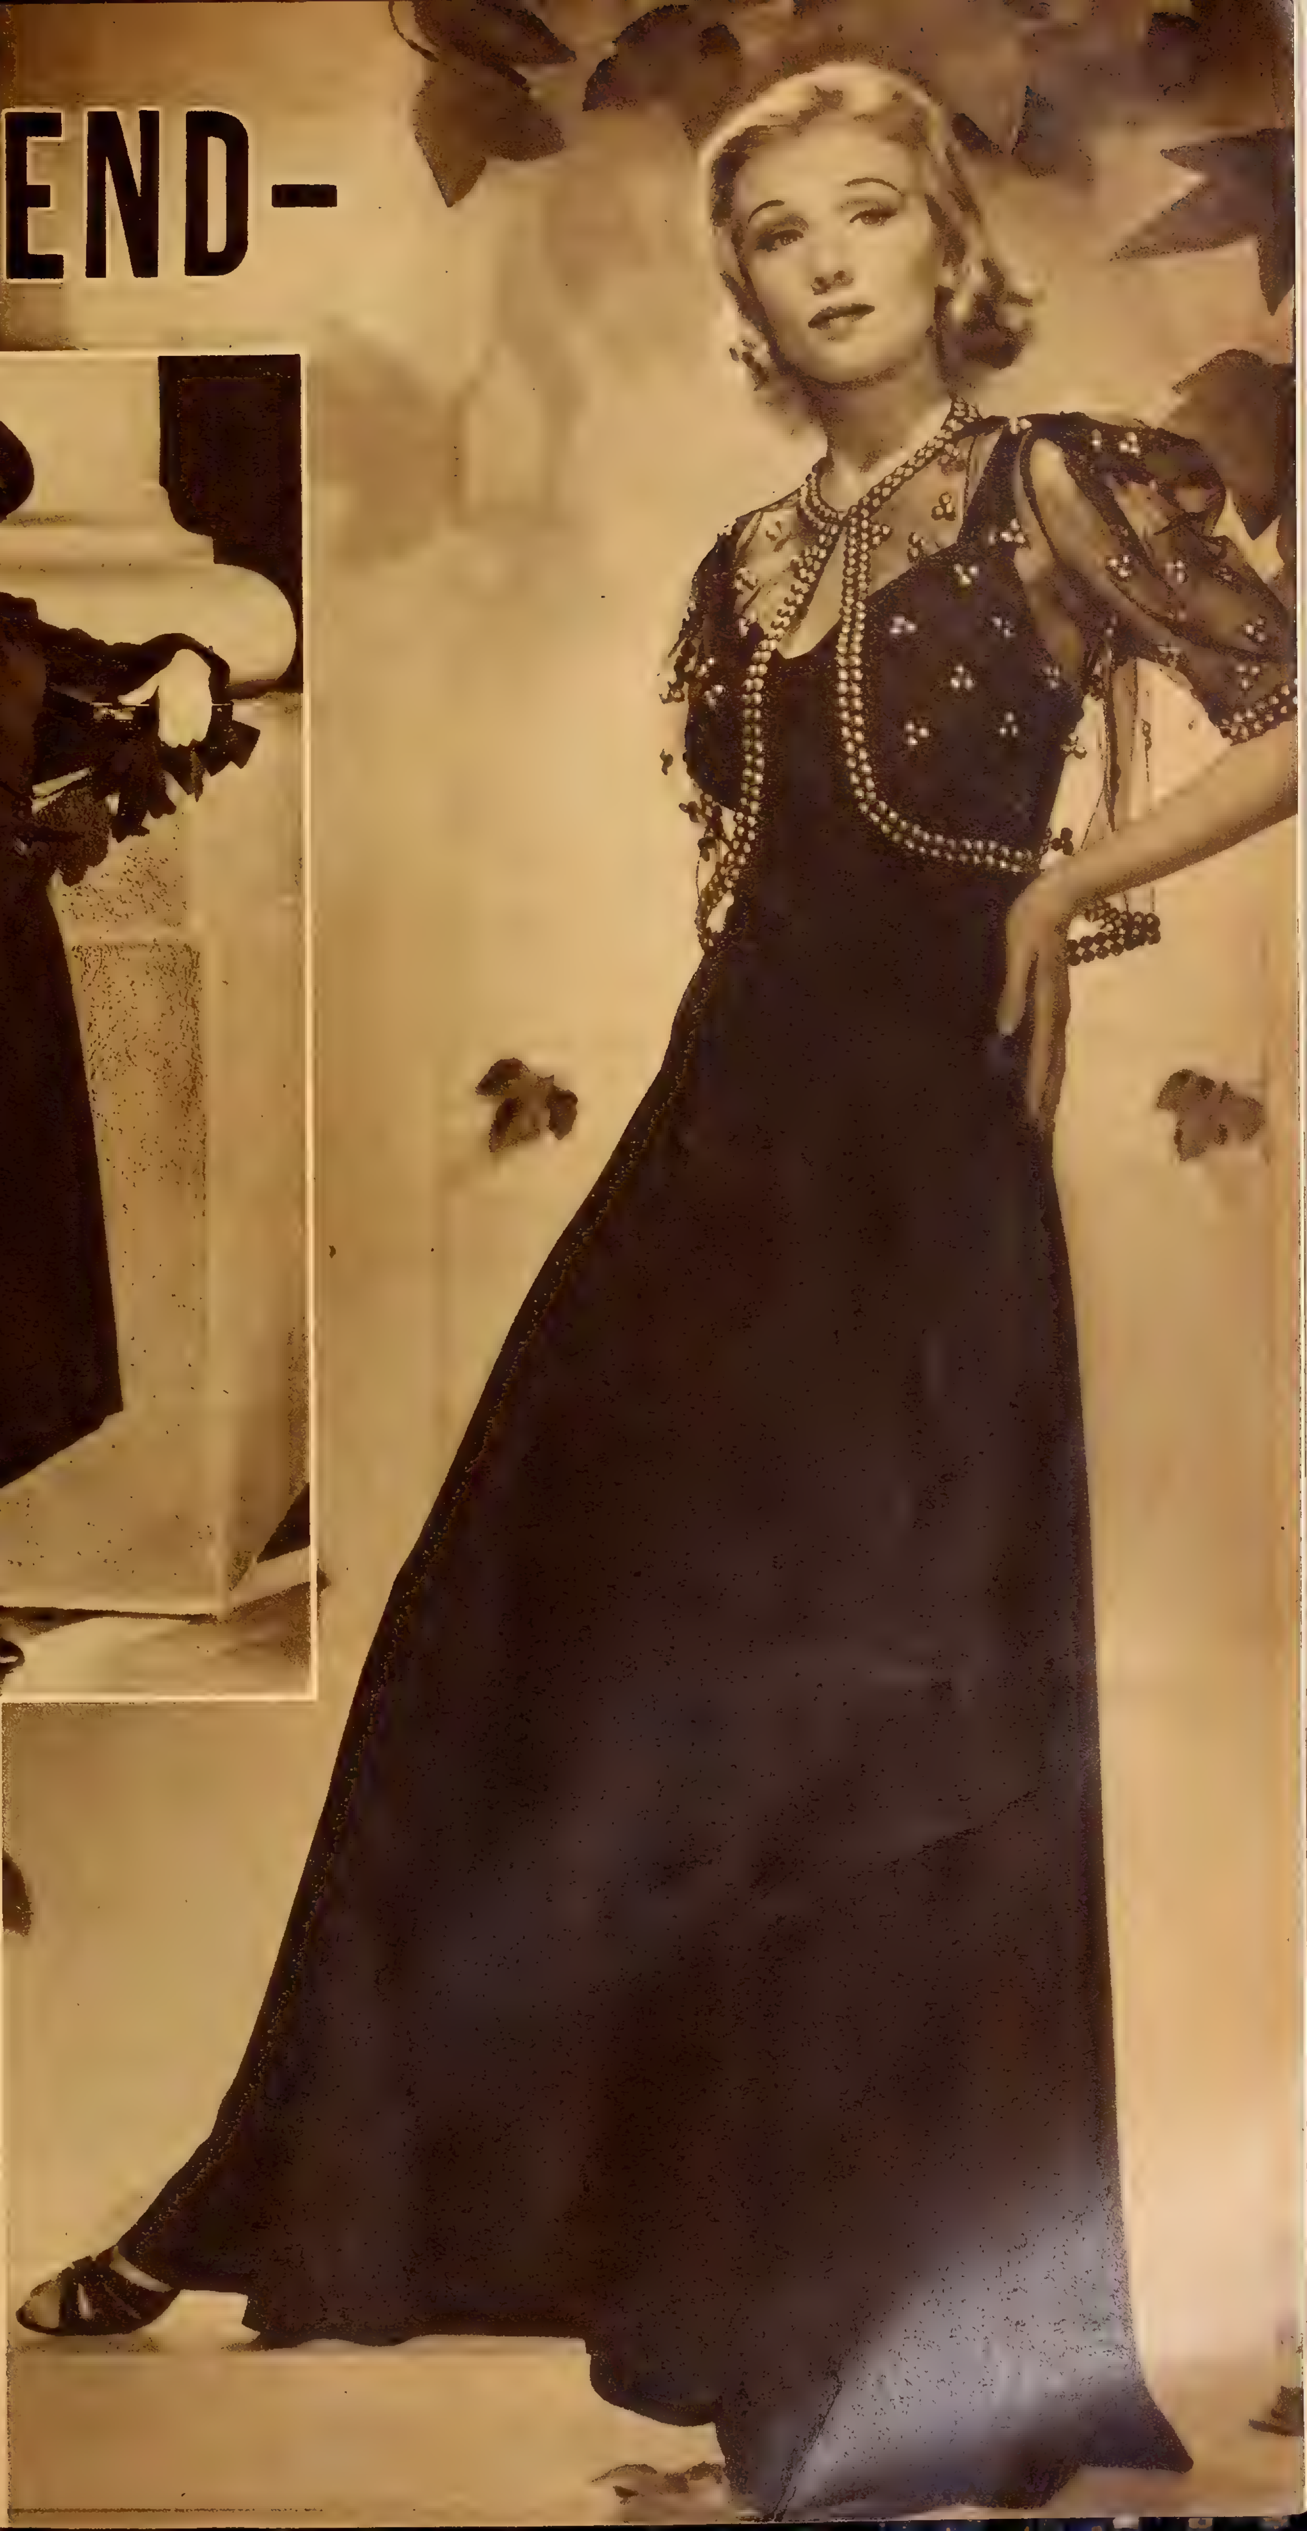
Perhaps I had better explain what I mean by basic costumes. They are the clothes around which you plan everything you buy. They are four outfits which can meet the needs of an average woman's life whether she stays at home or goes to business every day.

Now, what four would you pick? I've picked my four entries this month, so it's up to you to write in to me if you don't agree or if you've better suggestions than mine. The idea is to choose only what is most important to your individual scheme of living. Perhaps you have no need for a formal gown at all; in that case, you can add another daytime dress to replace the one evening gown I suggest among my four. The only idea that has to stay fixed is that these four costumes must have good lines and good quality.

Another thing to keep in mind, when choosing only a few clothes to see you through a season or several seasons, is color. You can't shoot at the rainbow when you're counting pennies. One color to which you key everything is the safest investment, especially if you want

TO SPEND—





A coat that will do smart duty in fall, winter and spring is Sylvia Sidney's tailored blue woolen. Note the cut of collar and cuffs.

If you can buy only one evening frock—make it a simple black crepe like Julie Haydon's and vary it with little jackets, flowers and accessories.

Maureen O'Sullivan chooses a pert felt beret in navy to go with her practical dark blue suit. A white blouse, featuring a high neckline, adds to the costume's trimness.

to cut down the accessory buying. One color sounds dull but it needn't be if you use a little imagination because you can set it off with an infinite variation of contrasting shades. Year in and year out there are three colors which are standbys—they are black, brown and blue. The browns may vary from chocolate to copper and the blues may change from navy to purple blues but basically they remain the same. And they are the color standard to which the budget wardrobe can safely cling.

But let's get on to the four costumes I've picked for the budget sweepstakes. All are winners—safe bets in a season of such elegant frivolity as we've been having, sure bets when the fashion tide turns to tailored simplicity. Number one is the coat that can't be dated—its cut is tailored, its fabric a fine textured woolen. It looks, this season, like the one Sylvia Sidney is wearing. And you shouldn't pay less than twenty-five dollars for it because you won't get a fabric that will stand three seasons and possibly another year's wear unless you pay that much.

Sylvia's coat is made of a navy blue woolen and is cut on the classic reefer style. It has a double-breasted cut, a slight flare to the skirt and the wider lapels give it a distinctive air. Sylvia finds that it looks as well with silk and woolen dresses as it does with tailored suits. She wears wool scarfs at the neckline in the fall and winter, gay silk ones in the spring. And it takes to a fur cape or scarf with the proper lift to elegance!

Incidentally, that brimmed felt hat is a good budget item because its very simplicity makes it adaptable to any daytime outfit. Sylvia wears it either turned up off the face, as pictured, or turned down over the eyes and tilted a little to vary the wearing.

Costume number two is some form of the tailored suit. It can be the strictly man tailored woolen suit, the dress and jacket combination, the softer tailored suit or the ensemble made up of coat and dress or coat, skirt and blouse. It's up to you to choose the one that suits your needs the most perfectly. Personally, I think the tailored suit of a good suiting worsted is the most versatile because it provides you with a year 'round standby for sports, travel, business and general daytime wear. It can be infinitely varied with accessories, sweaters and blouses and it gives you a trim, well-groomed appearance even when it begins to get a little shabby.

Two grand suits for wear now under your winter coats and later as your first spring (Continued on page 100)

One good tailored suit will give you an all-round costume. Sylvia Sidney wears a well-cut one with striped lapel piping and matching scarf.

Through Buddy Rogers she has taken a miraculous new lease on happiness

LOVE COMES TO MARY PICKFORD

A CHAPTER in Hollywood history is closing. A new chapter is opening.

In the spring Mary Pickford will become the bride of Charles (Buddy) Rogers. And Pickfair will be closed—or sold.

"I'm going to start with a brand-new slate," Mary told me.

And as she spoke I saw that something sad has gone out of Mary's face. She reminded me of a hurt child who has been comforted.

We were sitting in the library at Pickfair one early winter afternoon. The French doors gave onto clipped green lawns, sloping gently to the curved swimming pool. The pale, silver-gilt sun shone on the white house, the guest houses, the willows and spiked pines; it misted the flower gardens and seemed to be resting in filmy farewell on this celebrated spot where, for so many years, America's Sweetheart received her famous guests, a renowned hostess of one of the most famous houses in the world.

"I'll be glad," Mary was laughing, a touch impishly, "not to be a little tin queen any more!"

"And you won't," I said, "live here at Pickfair, when you are married to Buddy?"

"No," said Mary, "oh, no. We really couldn't, you see. We really shouldn't. It wouldn't be fair to Bud. And I feel, too, with him, that we should begin life afresh, in new surroundings, in a home we build ourselves, for ourselves. That is his right—and mine."

And Mary fingered the slender platinum band on her engagement finger. A replica of the band which Buddy, also, wears on his finger. There was pride as well as tenderness in her smile. There was that new happiness, as shining as the bright band on her finger.

It is nice, I thought, to see Mary happy again.

She was saying, "I feel that Pickfair has served its purpose, has lived its life which is not my life any longer. It is time, now, for the doors to be closed. Or rather, it is time for me to close the doors behind me.

"It has known a very great deal of happiness and life and activity. I have been very happy here and very unhappy, too. It's odd, isn't it, and rather lovely—the way unhappiness fades and is forgotten and only happiness remains?

"I shall remember, now, only the happy hours at Pickfair. The echoes I shall hear all my life will be the echoes of the laughter these white walls (Continued on page 102)

A TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

By Leo Townsend

"Camille" turns out to be one of the most beautiful pictures of the year, with Garbo and Robert Taylor at their best.

★★★★ Camille (M-G-M)

Blessed with superb performances, an excellent script and splendid direction, "Camille" emerges as one of the most compellingly beautiful pictures of the year. It is also a personal triumph for Garbo, whose magnificent performance will stand out in the minds of many as her finest screen portrayal. To Marguerite Gautier, a role previously played by several first ladies of stage and screen, she brings new radiance and the magic of her artistry. "Camille" definitely and beyond doubt establishes Garbo as the screen's greatest actress.

The Swedish star is surrounded by a cast of expert players, headed by Robert Taylor, whose portrayal of Armand Duval, Marguerite's lover, is probably his first serious contribution to the screen. His work, of course, is overshadowed by Garbo's, but his fine performance will come as a surprise to those who heretofore regarded him as nothing more than a Glamor Boy. In addition to the stars, there are outstanding smaller parts by Lionel Barrymore, Henry Daniell, Jessie Ralph, Laura Hope Crews, Lenore Ulric and Rex O'Malley.

The Garbo seemed to sense that this picture was destined to make her more famous than ever, for she actually seemed cheerful during production work on it. She's been known as Gloomy Greta around the sets of her last few pictures, though indigestion may have had as much to do with it as pessimism. Her recent trip to the old country evidently helped her a lot. There were several indications of her change of mind, notably that she not only permitted music to be played on the set for the first time, but requested many numbers herself between shots when the players were sitting around. Then the fact that The Silent One sat around at all was startlingly new, since before this she's made for her dressing-room at the sound of the director's "cut." Also she worked overtime two nights in succession—twenty minutes once and almost three-quarters of an hour another time. The director and crew were so flabbergasted by that time that they needed to go home themselves to recover. Greta lets Bob buy her an ice-cream cone every day on the set. She is living in Jeanette MacDonald's former home now, well fortified from the world by an iron fence six feet high and three colored servants . . . Sets were magnificent on this film, though very few outsiders were allowed the privilege of so much as a peek at them for fear the star might be hanging around at the time. The period of 1846 in Paris was one of the gayest in history and M-G-M spared no expense to have perfect copies made of French rooms of that period, down to every sumptuous and costly detail. Costumes were also elaborate and costly. Garbo had eighteen of them, which utilized several thousand yards of material for skirts, petticoats, bustles, etc. Taylor had fourteen different costumes in the picture, but twenty-eight in reality, since Bob had a way of forgetting his silks and satins and moving too quickly.

★★★Beloved Enemy (Samuel Goldwyn)

Using the Irish Revolution as his theme, Mr. Samuel Goldwyn comes through with a production that is both beautifully romantic and stirringly dramatic. Its setting is Dublin, where the Irish patriots, led by Brian Aherne, are plaguing the British occupation forces. Henry Stephenson, an English peer, is sent to Ireland to attempt to iron out the situation. With him is his daughter, Merle Oberon. Aherne, whose identity is unknown to the British, meets Miss Oberon, and eventually they fall in love. Their romantic scenes, in the midst of the bitter revolution, are some of the most touching this season's screen has offered.

Both Aherne and Miss Oberon turn in topnotch performances, giving credence to a story which might have fallen apart in less capable hands. Henry Stephenson is excellent as the British diplomat, and there are outstanding performances by Jerome Cowan, who makes his screen debut as one of the revolution's leaders, Karen Morley, Donald Crisp and David Niven. Considerable credit must also go to director Henry C. Potter for his intelligent handling of the tragic theme. "Beloved Enemy" is certainly an addition to the long list of Goldwyn hits.

With an English cast like this one you might expect the usual gallons of tea on the set promptly at four. But Brian Aherne, David Niven, Henry Stephenson and Miss Oberon shifted their affections to buttermilk one day. It's as deadly a habit evidently as the tea one, though, for all four found themselves putting on unwelcome poundage—but couldn't give up that four o'clock orgy . . . Brian Aherne had a bad day at the studio during the picture's shooting. It started out grand enough, with word from the U. S. Department of Commerce's aviation section that he had passed his airplane pilot's test and received a private license. But he was "grounded" immediately. For Samuel Goldwyn heard about it the same day and issued orders that Brian couldn't leave the ground for the duration of the picture. Ruth Chatterton was the one who interested Brian in flying. After taking him for a spin, he became so enthused that he decided to take lessons himself. Fortunately for Brian—though unfortunately for Ruth—she was "grounded" at the time while playing in "Dodsworth" at the same studio, so she offered her plane to him. In order to prevent injuries to the several hundred players during the warfare scene, a new type of barbed wire was developed by studio technicians in the use of prop "entanglements." The wire is real, but the barbs are carefully fashioned bits of sponge rubber, painted with a metallic gloss, and then glued onto the strands . . . Every 1921 automobile that could still operate under its own power was "signed" for this picture if the Goldwyn studios could get hold of it. Ordinarily when cars of ancient vintage are needed for a film, they are obtained through agencies which keep a few on hand for just that purpose. But the needs for this picture far exceeded the demand and as a result a general S.O.S. was sent out to every garage in California. The cars were bought outright at five times the actual market price and were promptly destroyed during the filming of the battle scenes.

Bill Powell and his little helpmate, Myrna Loy—not to mention Asta—continue their comic antics in "After the Thin Man."

"Lloyds of London" boasts a grand story and a fine cast. Here are Tyrone Power and Madeleine Carroll.

★★★ After the Thin Man

(M-G-M)

That smoothest of all sleuths, Nick Charles, together with his wife and his justly famous wire-haired terrier, return once more to provide a sure-fire comedy drama that will please everyone who admired their first jamboree, "The Thin Man." Everyone knows by now that Nick Charles is Bill Powell and that his little helpmate is Myrna Loy. It will be welcome news, too, that Asta, the most genial of all screen canines, has been provided with a wife—a rather indiscreet wife, incidentally, who shares her favors with Asta and a neighborhood Scotty. Mrs. Asta's skullduggeries is but a minor item in the series of events which go to make up this swell comedy. It is enough to say that the suave Mr. Powell is once more called out of retirement to solve a mystery which baffles the audience and everyone else in the cast. In spite of Myrna (Continued on page 130)

Gene Raymond and Jeanette MacDonald receive two of Gene's guests, Loretta Young and Ed Sutherland.

Stuffing Jimmy Stewart at Gene Raymond's party are Fred March, Glenda Farrell and Anita Louise. And is he hungry!

The last-minute lowdown on who are going together and what's doing in gay, glamorous Hollywood

Looks like Simone Simon is casting amorous glances in the direction of Jimmy Stewart. Over on the "Seventh Heaven" set, where they're playing the roles which made Janet Gaynor and Charlie Farrell famous, Simone rushes out every day during the afternoon recess to procuureuu au bottle of soda pop for her leading man. If that isn't love, as the saying goes, it'll have to do until the soda pop man comes along. Next thing you know she'll be calling him Jimmy Jimmy.

Despite the French barrage, Jimmy Stewart seems to maintain his reputation as the most getting-around guy in Hollywood. You see him everywhere, and usually with a different gal. Of late, however, he's been confining his attentions more or less to Anita Louise. It all started when he took her to the Gene Raymond party, and the way things look it may turn out to be one of those permanent Hollywood romances which last for weeks.

Housewarmings in Hollywood are always the best excuse in town for a hangover. But the Arthur Hornblow, Jr.'s, first entertainment in their new home didn't provide any alibis. It was strictly tete-a-tete for one thing, and for another refreshments were limited to ham and eggs. Myrna decided she couldn't wait another month for their Cold Water Canyon home to be completed. So she staged a celebration for her husband in the only finished room in the house. It happened to be the laundry room and the Hornblows breakfasted one Sunday morning on a plank laid over the laundry tub, while the little woman concocted the meal on a camp stove.

Shirley Temple went to Palm Springs to recover from a cold during production of her new picture, "Stowaway," so Mack Gordon, one of the film's song writers, went down to teach her a few numbers while she was convalescing. Shirley was back on the set a few days later, looking well and happier than ever. "Poor Mack," she explained, "he's in bed. He said I gave him temporary exhaustion."

Hearts and Flowers: Although Nelson Eddy is seldom linked romantically in the public prints with this fair lady or that, it is known that he pays his most constant court to the divorced wife of Director Sidney Franklin. Mrs. Franklin, shortly after her divorce, was rumored about to marry Conrad Nagel, bu she's been seeing no one but Nelson.

When Bill Powell and Myrna Loy were in San Francisco for location shots in "After The Thin Man," the company checked in at one of the local hotels. The clerk, who had probably seen Myrna play Mrs. Powell in too many pictures, asked Bill if he'd like the bridal suite. The very polite Mr. P. replied, "Yes, indeed, but I understand there's a Mr. Hornblow on this trip."

Lily Pons is still struggling with her English, but she insists she's improving. On the set of "That Girl From Paris" one day the sound man played back one of her scenes for her. "Do you like it?" he asked. "Oh, but yes," answered Mlle. Pons. "I can understand every word I say!"

Worst Joke of the Month: On the "Souls at Sea" set at Paramount, Henry Wilcoxon and Frances Dee were rehearsing a scene when lunch was called. Wilcoxon yelled to a prop boy to come over and chalk their positions so they'd know where they stood when they returned from no attention, so Wilcoxon, quick as a flash, said: "Oh, so you won't chalk, eh?" Do you blame the prop boy?

And what about Jean Harlow? For the past month or so she and Bill Powell have taken very little part in Hollywood night life. New night clubs have opened and old ones have been redecorated, but it seems to make no difference to La Belle. She's turned out to be a home girl. All of which is a fine thing, because we think there ought to be a Harlow in every home—but it would be nice if her mother would let her out just once in a while.

The Errol Flynn-Lili Damita situation still puzzles everyone —including, perhaps, Miss D and Mr. F. Two days after they announced a separation they flew to New York together for a second honeymoon which was to include a trip abroad, after which Errol was to brave the wilds of Borneo with gun and publicity. Then came a call from Warners that he was needed for lead in "The Prince and the Pauper" so Errol cut short the Bette's well-publicized feud with Warner Brothers—final score: Warners, 48, Davis,—$50,000—is packed away on the studio shelf and forgotten. "I'm really glad to be back at work again," said Bette. "I've been over a year without salary, and even actresses have to eat." She also took time out to deny there was any friction between her and hubby Harmon Nelson. He's in New York working for a theatrical agency. When he learns the business he'll return to Hollywood and Mrs. Nelson.

Miriam Hopkins and Mrs. Fred Astaire had never met socially until recently, when they got together with a bang in Beverly Hills. Miriam's car smashed into the Astaire limousine, causing no end of commotion. When Kay Francis left for New York recently, Connie Bennett and Gilbert Roland were on the same airliner. It looked like a foursome for a while, since Michael Whalen had been enjoying a cocktail with the party a few minutes earlier in the lounge. Leaving them, he wandered out to have his ticket validated—and discovered everything swell except that he was at the wrong airport.

Natives of Palm Springs and the desert region had their thrill of the year when "Camille" was world-premiered at the new Plaza Theatre there. Many of the stars flew down for the occasion—among them Bob Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck, who were separated for an hour after the show by swarms of fans demanding autographs. And there were so many lights that hardy desert rats from miles around hiked in, thinking the town was on fire.

Out on the "John Meade's Woman" set, Edward Arnold blew up in his lines eight times straight. Stumbling block was the line: "I love you, darling, I love you!" After the eighth error, Eddie turned to the director. "Sorry, old boy," he said, "but I haven't said anything as silly as that for thirty years."

Kay Francis and Delmer Daves gave snapshooter Muto the wave as they took off for a trip to Europe. Maybe they're wed now.

Many a Hollywood star does her shopping attired in last year's slacks and a pair of dark glasses, because shopkeepers have a way of doubling their prices when little Miss Glamor Girl comes in. Gloria Stuart, for instance, had been shopping for furniture in full disguise until one day she dropped into the shop as is. "You look enough like Gloria Stuart to be her twin sister," said a clerk, "except, of course, that she's cross-eyed. Never comes in here without thick-lensed glasses."

We watched Carole Lombard swishing around on the "Swing High, Swing Low" set at Paramount the other day, attired in two inches of white chiffon and two carloads of white ostrich feathers. We thought it all looked pretty elegant, and couldn't understand the worried look in Travis Banton's face. "These gowns give me the jitters," he said. "They're strictly honky-tonk fashions, but Lombard makes them look so modish that I'm afraid every woman in the country will copy them—and probably look like a herd of ostriches."

The hairdresser came up just then to arrange Carole's blonde curls for a close-up. "This wave won't stay in place unless we dampen it again," she announced, calling to a prop boy for a pan of water. "Never mind the water," said the glamorous Carole. "Just spit on it."

June Lang is still nervous about it. The young lady who went through the war in "Road to Glory" and the jungles in "White Hunter," without so much as a quiver, has finally lost her composure. It all happened during the Hollywood Hotel broadcast following the preview of "One In A Million." The preview and broadcast were held on one of the sound stages at 20th Century-Fox studio, and at this particular moment Louella Parsons was bouncing up and down the aisles, microphone in hand, hunting celebrities. She spotted Miss L. and gushed, "Oh, June, won't you please tell me the date of your wedding with Victor McLaglen?" June blushed, Louella blushed, and there are no reports on the condition of Vic Orsatti, Miss Lang's intended groom.

■ ■ ■

"One In A Million" introduces a new star to the screen. She is Sonja Henie, the former Olympic skating champion. Sonja brings an entirely new type of personality to Hollywood, and her studio is planning to take off her skates immediately and star her in dramatic roles. Incidentally, she's quite charming off the screen, too, according to Tyrone Power, who has monopolized all of the little lady's evenings. He even packed her into a plane and flew her to Cincinnati for Christmas so she could meet his family.

Pat O'Brien congratulates bridegroom, John Barrymore and bride, Elaine Barrie. Mrs. Jacobs, the bride's ma, looks on.

Out on the "Holy Terror" set, the young lady playing the title role was enjoying a race around the sound stage with a playful prop man. The young lady, who was Jane Withers, suddenly sprawled flat on her face on the floor. "I didn't trip," she said to the guy. "You musta pushed me." But the prop man pointed out the fact she had been a couple of yards in the lead. "Well, I apologize," said Jane. "But don't do it again."

The Warner Brothers, stockholders and board of directors, went into the biggest conference of the year the other day. Closeted for several hours, they finally emerged, weary but relieved. A momentous decision had been reached. Dick Powell, by official vote, can now shave off his mustache. It seems Joan Blondell wasn't half as crazy about the mustache as she was about Dick, and you know how it is when the little woman makes up her mind. What really swung the pow-wow in Dick's favor was a written statement sent in by him after the conference looked like a deadlock. The note said: "I can't be happy behind it."

Brian Donlevy and Marjorie Lane are married now.

At the preview of "Banjo on My Knee," the Barbara Stanwyck-Joel McCrea river rhapsody, we sat behind Miss S. and the ever-present Bob Taylor. The fact that Stanwyck and Taylor are constant companions seems to have enhanced Barbara's popularity with audiences, for at the picture's finish there was considerable applause for her. Even her critical companion must have liked her performance, for he favored her with an affectionate pat on the head. And a pat on the head from Taylor is a lot better than most girls are doing these days.

People thought Carole Lombard was going Garbo on them when she had the "Swing High, Swing Low" set closed to visitors. As a rule the Lombard sets are wide open to anyone with a pass and a desire to watch the Lombard antics. But when "Swing High, Swing Low" started, nine-tenths of the visitors cornered Carole to ask her about the Clark Gable romance. So now Lombard is behind locked doors where she can keep her romance and her acting to herself.

Gayest social affair of the month was Gene Raymond's dinner party for some 250 guests at his new home. Almost everyone, who is anybody in Hollywood, was there, plus a number who aren't anyone at all. Two hundred and fifty is a lot of people to ask over to the house for dinner, but Gene had evidently informed the cook of his plans, for everyone had a merry evening of it.

Man Bites Dog Dept.: Reversing the using procedure, the 150 extras in the cast of Universal's "Top of the Town" pooled together and bought packages of Scotch for Director Ralph Murphy and his assistants. Seems they all had had four weeks steady employment, something novel in the life of an extra, and it sort of went to their heads.

Questions without answers: What prominent screen actor is rumored to have married his bride only because in a generous moment he had previously signed over his property to her? By marrying the gal, under the California law, he is entitled to half of his own property.

When they make a picture at Warners everyone works hard and fast, but Henry Fonda didn't know it until he was loaned out by the Walter Wanger studio for a part with Pat O'Brien in "Slim." At the end of the first day's shooting Henry dropped in at his home studio to say hello. "How's the picture coming?" he was asked. "Coming!" said Henry. "We're half through!"

The Gene Markeys (Joan Bennett) attend a recent premiere.

Your surprise of the month will probably come when you see Janet Gaynor in the new Technicolor picture, "A Star is Born." For the first time in her screen career, Gaynor doesn't play a demure little gal who spreads sweetness and light wherever she goes. In private life, Miss G. is hardly the demure type, but ever since her first success in "Seventh Heaven" her producers have convinced everyone she's the sweetest thing since Mary Pickford. Don't tell anyone, but it's been bruited about that in "A Star is Born" she wears—for the first time on any screen—silk stockings. A girl who does that will even smoke cigarettes!

Is 20th Century-Fox deglamorizing Simone Simon? Now that she has the old Janet Gaynor role in "Seventh Heaven," any reference to the petite pouter as exotic meets with hushed horror at her studio. And no one seems to remember those recent billboards with flaming letters announcing that mademoiselle possessed "The allure of a woman—the charm of a girl."

THE VARIED ACTIVITIES OF

MRS. LOUIS SWIFT, JR.

MRS. LOUIS SWIFT, JR., of Chicago's prominent family, is well-known throughout the Middle West and East for her vivid and active life. She entertains frequently with small, superbly appointed dinners. "Camels," says Mrs. Swift, "contribute to the success of my dinners. Their delicate flavor suits the equally delicate flavors in the food, and they also help digestion. I always allow enough time between courses so that every one may smoke a Camel through."

MRS. SWIFT DINES in the Casino Room of Chicago's Congress Hotel. "Here, too," says Joseph Spagat, Maître de Café, "Camels are the favorite cigarette."

AS A SPORTSWOMAN, Mrs. Swift is world famous. She spent dangerous months in India and Africa hunting wild boars, tigers, elephants. In the States, during the winter season when society is so engrossed with outdoor sports, Mrs. Swift enjoys skiing. "It's fun," she says, "but requires healthy nerves. So Camels are the only cigarette I care to smoke. They set me on my way feeling right."

Camel's aid to digestion . . . on your busy days!

Most modern women lead quite active lives. Preparing meals, parent-teachers' activities, and social life are enough to tax nerves and affect digestion. A pleasant way to assist good digestion is to smoke Camels during meals and afterward. Smoking Camels promotes the natural flow of fluids so necessary for good digestion. Alkalinity increases. Tension eases. A comforting "lift" follows. Equally important is Camel's mildness. They never get on your nerves, or tire your taste. Smoke Camels for digestion's sake—and better "busy days"!

GINGER ROGERS' TRUE LIFE STORY

Intimate facts and romantic episodes in a big star's life

By Gladys Hall

Meet Miss Virginia Katherine McMath who, at one year, faces the camera like a trouper. Can't you see the resemblance to the Ginger Rogers' of today?

This quiet picture of Ginger with her father, Eddins McMath, gives no hint of the stormy battle he later waged for the child's control, even going so far as to kidnap her.

AT TWO-THIRTY on the morning of July 16, 1911, in the little town of Independence, Missouri, a little girl was born. She was christened Virginia Katherine McMath.

The circumstances of her birth were singular.

All that night, preceding her birth, the heavens had been in convulsions, thunder roared and crashed, lightning made fire flowers in the skies. And then, just before the first small cry was heard, a star fell. A hush, a peace descended upon the earth. And the baby was born.

She weighed six and a half pounds. She was bald. Her blue eyes, dewy then as they are now, held that look of slight surprise when they looked into the triumphant eyes of her mother. There was, otherwise, nothing remarkable about her.

The mother, the good country doctor and the baby were alone in that little white frame, four-room cottage at the end of the little trolley line in Independence for, several months before the child was born, Lela McMath had "eloped," so to speak. She deliberately cut herself off from her family—her mother and father, her husband and mother-in-law—so that she might live the kind of a life she felt she must live in order that the child might survive. For there had been another baby girl, born shortly after Lela Owens' marriage to Eddins McMath. The baby had lived only a few hours.

And so, when the small Virginia Katherine was on her way, the young mother made up her mind that this time it should be different. She believed in prenatal influence. She believed that the prenatal period should be one of peace. And there was not, even then, peace between the young McMaths. This time, she vowed to herself, she would create peace with her own hands and brains and energies. She had her own ideas of the life she wanted to live, while waiting for her child. There had to be no irritations, no opposition and clash of wills and temperaments. It had to be her life—and the child's.

And so, one day, without so much as leaving a note on the pin cushion, with only twenty dollars in her purse, without telling anyone she was going, and hardly knowing where she was going herself, Lela McMath boarded the train out of Kansas City. When, evening approaching, the train stopped at Independence, Lela got off. She felt they would be less likely to look for her here, so comparatively close to home, than farther afield.

THERE WAS a trolley near the station. Lela boarded it, still without the faintest idea as to her destination. She only knew, and only cared, that she was free. The trolley bumped along until it came to the end of the line. There seemed to be no place further to go, so Lela McMath got out. There, in a field at the track's end, was a small, white frame cottage. On the door was a sign which said "To Let—Furnished." The people next door were the owners. Lela McMath rented the cottage, paid a five-dollar deposit and moved in that night.

The next morning, bright and early, Lela went forth to look for a job. The first place she came to was a newspaper office. That was fine. She had always wanted to be a writer. She applied for the job of general reporter—and got it.

"I honestly can't say," said Ginger's small, remarkable mother, "that I dreamed of a child who would be famous, who would save the world or perpetuate his name in enduring stone. I thought the baby would be a boy. I didn't care especially one way or the other. I just wanted the baby to come into the world, born of a happy, active mother—a baby who would live. That baby came to me. And so, on that July dawning the baby was born. Shortly before her birth, Lela McMath had had occasion to go into Kansas City to report an Art Exhibition for her paper. There, awaiting a trolley on a main thoroughfare crowded with people, she found herself staring down at a man's feet. A man's feet with something curiously familiar about them. She looked up. The man was her father.

There was, of course, a dramatic meeting. Where had she been? How could she have done so terrible a thing to her mother, to her husband and to him? They had been frantic. They had searched everywhere. They had employed detectives (but they had not found her, in Independence, less than twenty-five miles from home!), And then the father's eyes, shocked and troubled, took in the situation. Lela begged him not to give her away, implored him not to tell at home that he had seen her. She reminded him of the death of her first baby, that her husband hadn't wanted that baby and didn't really want this one. She assured him that she was happy, had a job, was safe and would keep in touch with him if only he would keep faith with her, keep secret her whereabouts.

Lela Owens McMath with her new baby daughter of ten weeks. Even at this early stage, Ginger looked to her mother for approval and guidance.

At three years, Ginger's sparkling personality began to manifest itself. Her red hair, blue eyes and freckles added to her baby charm.

But the father, fearful of such unprecedented behavior, told Lela's mother. And Lela's mother, conservative, old-school, firmly believing that a woman's place is with her husband and nowhere else, felt it her duty to tell Lela's husband. And so, a day or so after the baby's birth, the husband and father, Lela's mother and mother-in-law descended upon her. They formed a vigorous body, protesting that they had never heard of such outrageous goings-on. Was she temporarily insane? Didn't she know that in her condition she should have been sitting quietly at home, not tramping the streets as a reporter? And the pool of peace in which Lela McMath had lived while her baby was coming, was shattered. Fortunately, too late to do any harm. For Lela McMath, looking at the sturdy, rosy mite in the crook of her arm, knew that she had scored her point, could afford to concede the next point if she had to. It seemed that she did have to.

AND SO, shortly after the baby's birth, temporarily defeated, Lela allowed the family to take her back home to Kansas City again. There, for the first several months of her life, Virginia Katherine (for she was called by her full two names during her babyhood and childhood) began to experiment with life.

She began to talk at the age of nine months. Her first word was "Mackey," which was her name for her mother. She began to walk at the age of fourteen months. She never cried. She was always smiling, serene and good natured. There was nothing, her mother says, remarkably outstanding about her except, perhaps, her sunny disposition. Trifles, then as now, never bothered her. If some child took a toy away from her, she didn't cry and whine about it, she got another toy. It was as if, even then, she could discriminate between the trivial and the important. For if, on the other hand, anyone attempted to remove her food before she was finished she put up a big fight for it.

Even now, Ginger Rogers has an amazing faculty for putting big things first. She never dissipates her energy in tempers over minor things. If she slams a door on her hand she doesn't carry on as though she had undergone a fatal accident. If her cook or chauffeur is late, she tells them to watch the clock—and forgets it. If she is invited to a party on a date with Jimmy Stewart and can't go because of work, she shrugs it off, knowing that parties and dates are not as important as work. On the other hand, if something is really important she will go to bat about it with vigor and unshakable determination. As when, recently, a certain leading man was named for one of her pictures. Very quietly but very firmly she stated that she did not want him, would not have him, and why. She explained that there was nothing personal in her stand. She simply did not consider him the type for the part, for the picture. It was a battle. She went to battle and won.

PERHAPS, TOO, her infant rage when food was removed from her was another one of the few portents pointing to the Ginger Rogers of today. For Ginger loves to eat and is one of the few stars who will admit it. When she is hungry she is frank about it. She never has dieted in her life. She likes everything to eat but if she ever is in doubt, she always orders eggs in some form. She drinks quarts of iced tea on the set and during rehearsals.

And also then, as now, she entered into life and its various activities with good will, genial interest, enthusiasm. She was from the beginning, a giving-of-herself little girl, warm and eager and friendly. She always made friends.

"There were no routines, no baby schedules in the days when Ginger was a baby," her mother told me. "We just loved 'em and reared 'em then. Wherever I went, Ginger went. If I went to a party, she went to a party. If I went to church, she went to church. If we had company, she stayed up with me until I went to bed. She was like a pocketbook which I carried with me everywhere, putting it down and taking it up as I went.

At fourteen, Ginger tried out for the Charleston Contest in Fort Worth, Texas. Her winning of it started her on her career.

A pocketbook (of all descriptions for an infant!) into which, I think, Lela McMath put the sterling silver and gold coins of her own honesty and fearlessness, determination and sense of fair play, her gallant credo of living.

Ginger's father, Eddins McMath, was an electrical engineer in Kansas City where, with singular significance, he first met Lela Owens at dancing school! And they became engaged when Lela was about to accompany her engineer father to Utah. They were married on Lela's eighteenth birthday, which happens to be Christmas Day. The ceremony was performed in the parlor of a little house in Salt Lake City, whither Eddins McMath had followed his bride-to-be. And the windows of the parlor fronted on the famous Joseph Smith house, that sturdy Mormon of the eight sons and numerous wives.

Young Lela and her husband did not live happily ever after. It was a marriage destined to be fraught with drama; a marriage which predestined the amazing career of Lela McMath and the subsequent stellar career of the small Virginia Katherine.

NOT LONG after the marriage, Eddins McMath accepted a position in Ennis, Texas. It was that of electrical engineer for Hetty Green's railroad. He worked at the round house, testing, repairing. Lela and the baby kept house. And then Lela roused suddenly to the realization that they were living on the wrong side of the tracks and that her husband was that hated thing, a strike-breaker. She most emphatically did not want to live on the wrong side of any tracks nor have her daughter live there. Something had to be done about it. And with the initiative that is Lela Rogers', she took on a small, twelve-year-old girl to care for the baby and, she herself, got a job playing the piano in a picture house. The added funds would, in time, enable them to move to the right side of the tracks.

In the meantime, and some twenty months after the birth of Virginia Katherine, another baby girl was born to Lela—stillborn. Attempting one morning to move a heavy piece of furniture, she slipped, the bureau slipped, too, and the fatality resulted.

With the birth of this third baby—the death of her first baby—Lela McMath found herself saying, "Somewhere in the world there is a better life for me and for my baby. I am going to find it."

And as before, reckoning consequences only in terms of her own energy and resourcefulness, Lela moved out of her husband's house and into the local hotel where she took the job of public stenographer. She put up a clothes basket with a little fence about it next to her desk and there the baby played and gurgled at strangers, made friends of all and sundry, young and old, even as the grown-up Ginger does today.

And there, from that clothes basket, close to her mother's desk, occurred the first kidnapping of Ginger Rogers.

For one harrowing day the young mother turned back from taking dictation over the telephone and found the clothes basket empty. No one had seen the child go. No one needed to. Lela McMath knew that the kidnapper of her child was the child's own father She had fought for the child's life before she was born. She was fighting for the child's livelihood after she was born and she could fight, too, for the child's possession.

By devious methods, with the clue of a letter from a woman the father had employed to care for the child, Lela found out that her baby was in Bessemaye, Texas. The nurse wrote that the child was neglected, dirty, not properly cared for save in the intermittent times when she had charge of her. The baby, she wrote, kept crying for "my Mackey." Surely she would find the means to come to her.

Lela found the means. She had, first, to barter, badger and cajole a man to drive her. No one wanted to have any part of it, sensing a kidnapping. But she finally succeeded. And then began the long, torturous drive of 86 miles which took 36 hours to cover. That car took unblazed trails, manned only by a somewhat enfeebled middle-aged man and the small, blonde dauntless Lela. There were streams to be bridged and forded. There were tree stumps to be hewn down and carted out of the way before the car could get through. They dared not shelter anywhere lest their pilgrimage be noted and a warning issued. They ran out of food and were hungry. They ran out of gas, were stranded and had to trek miles to the nearest gas station. And there were no "nearest" gas stations in that desolate country. But Lela, armed with a gun, knowing that at the end of the trail was her baby, uncared for and crying for her "Mackey," would have scaled the Matterhorn, swum the Hellespont, crossed the Sahara on foot to get to her.

AND SHE did get to her. When, at long last, they skirted Bessemaye, Lela reconnoitred, mapped out in her mind the positions of the hotel, the place where Eddins McMath was employed, the house in which he lived. And only after many hours of watchful waiting did they dare pass the house. And there on the front porch, alone in her highchair, sat the baby. She was sticky and unbathed and her little dress was stained and smudged. She was covered with insect bites. For the first time in her baby life there were streaks of tears on her poor little face.

And at that sight Lela McMath was out of the car, up the shale path, on to that front porch, the baby clasped fiercely in her arms. And then and there she discovered that she had a fight on her hands. She was stunned by the sudden appearance at the screen door of—her mother-in-law. She had not counted on this, had not known that her mother-in-law was there. And then, with her baby under one arm, her gun under the other, she began what amounted to a physical tussle. She managed to wedge her foot against the screen door so that the elder and enraged Mrs. McMath could not get out. And then, counting on her own swifter motions, she made a dash for the car. But the elder Mrs. McMath moved swiftly, too. For while Lela still held the front door fast with her foot, the older woman made a dash for a side door which also opened on the porch and caught up with Lela and the baby just as they got into the car. Lela screamed frantically at her terrified and compulsory "chauffeur" and conspirator. "Start going!" she cried. "Move! Get on!" The car, with dramatic appropriateness, took this occasion to stall. At any moment Eddins, so short a distance away, might hear the clamor and come to his mother's aid. Then, indeed, all would be lost.

Lela tried to disengage the clinging hands from the car. The older woman was shrieking, "You can't do this. It's kidnapping!" Lela laughed at that. She must have thought of the pot calling the kettle black. But she didn't have time to think. The situation called for action. She could not, obviously, push her mother-in-law into the road and possibly under the car. The man at the wheel was whimpering, "Keerful, now, keerful!" And at last Lela reached out, pulled the protesting woman into the tonneau and said, "Very well, then, you go with us, at least until we get out of town." They drove on. On the way Lela advised her mother-in-law to reconsider, to get out while there was still time and opportunity to get a lift back to Bessemaye. Realizing that her daughter-in-law meant business, the elder Mrs. McMath reluctantly and with many threats and intimidations consented to be dropped.

After her divorce from Eddins McMath, Ginger's mother later married John Rogers and they moved to Fort Worth, Texas. Here is the house on Cooper Street where they lived. Ginger took her step-father's name.

Thus the first spectacular kidnapping of Ginger Rogers—though not the last.

Back in Ennis, Lela received word from her family. Many words and strong words. She must come home, they said. What was she thinking of with such Annie Oakley-ish goings-on? It was disgraceful. It did no good to the baby. She was to return and live with them. She was to make up her mind what she wanted to do and above all behave herself.

Back in Kansas City, then, there was a gathering of the clans, the clans of McMaths and Owens. A council of war with a few peace terms—and those not kept. A divorce finally was agreed upon. The agreement stipulated that Lela was to have custody of the child, with permission granted to the father to have her on Sundays.

He did have her on Sundays. He also, Lela began to suspect, had her more often than Sundays. Somehow he was contriving to see her either at kindergarten or while she was at play. For Virginia Katherine would, occasionally, exhibit a shiny dime or a fifty-cent piece and when asked where she had got it would say, "My Daddy gave it to me." The child had no ill feeling toward her father, nor has she now. For Lela Rogers, wisely and kindly, has never talked against Eddins McMath to his daughter.

There came, soon, the occasion of the second kidnapping.

THERE CAME the Sunday when the baby did not come home. The appointed hour came and passed. Dusk deepened into night, but no baby. And as night fell, Lela went to the boarding-house where, at the time, Eddins and his mother were living. She was told that Mr. McMath and his mother had checked out that morning, bag and baggage, destination unknown. Virginia Katherine was, at this time, between three and four years old.

Days passed. Eventually there came a letter mailed from Nebraska. Lela had a pretty shrewd idea that the letters were mailed from Nebraska but NOT by Eddins

When Ginger was sixteen, she married Jack Pepper, a handsome boy she had admired for years. They appeared in vaudeville together during the brief span of their ten-months' marriage.

McMath. He would not be likely to give her so explicit a clue. At any rate, the letter said, substantially, that possession is nine points of the law; that he intended to make this a test case and that Lela would never see the baby again until "the case" had been settled once and for all. But the case had been settled by the divorce, which awarded the mother complete custody of the child, granting the father permission to have her Sundays.

Lela was, at this time, a sort of half-partner in an office supplies house. She had invested most of her savings in the business and they were prospering nicely. She went to a detective agency, fully aware that the expense attached would exceed her small invested capital, force her out of the business. It did.

The detective who worked on the case, a man by the name of Ely, has since become famous. He did not realize then that he was working on a kidnapping case which, only a few years later, when a mere threat of kidnapping is made, becomes front page news the world over.

After some three weeks, Eddins, his mother and the baby were finally located in St. Louis. Lela's detective got there just in time. Just in time to discover that the child had been entered at a convent and was to have been sent there the morning after their arrival. If this plan had been accomplished, it might have been years, it might have been that never would Lela have had her baby again. The child might have been entered under a different name. There were all sorts of means by which her identity might have been lost to the world—and to her mother. "I think I would have found her even in the catacombs," Lela says fiercely, even today, "but certainly if they had got her into that convent, it would have doubled my difficulties, delayed things for, who knows, how long."

But Detective Ely arrived in time and brought the trio back to Kansas City. And after a stormy battle, the winning side, aided and abetted by the child saying to the Ginger's first musical comedy role was in the Broadway show, "Top Speed," in 1931.

Opposite, "Girl Crazy" proved a hit for Ginger. Here she is with her leading man, Allen Kearns (right).

From the early productions, above, emerged this fast-stepping, successful star whose red hair now gleams with gold and whose freckles are beauty spots.

One of Ginger's first moving pictures was with Ed Wynn in "Manhattan Mary." Later she asked a release from her Paramount contract and got it only too quickly!

Judge, "I want to live with my Mackey," the court finally and forever deeded the custody of the child to the mother, ruling even the father's Sunday privileges out.

"The night before we went to court," Mrs. Rogers reminisced, with a slightly wry smile, "Ginger spent in jail. She was the charge of the court, you see, her possession undecided, and so she could be with neither her father nor me."

And there again is a screaming headline lost to the world. What a press sensation it would be if, today, the papers banner-lined GINGER ROGERS IN JAIL!

There was one more attempt made at kidnapping the baby. But Lela and her family were made wise by experience and the attempt was frustrated. And after that, no more. Eddins McMath died when Ginger was eleven years old. They never saw him again. But in later years both Lela and Ginger saw Grandmother McMath. Ginger cared for her and, in her old age, the elderly woman admitted that she and her son were wrong, that she deeply regrets all that happened and that Lela was within her rights. Grandmother McMath joined her son three years ago.

AND SO Lela had her baby again. They continued to live at home with Lela's parents. Small Virginia Katherine went to public school—she has never been to a private school in her life—in the old 6th Ward of Kansas City. She was five when she entered school. And she went back and forth with her mother's little sister, her own very young Aunt Jean aged, at the time, eight years. The young aunt, whose full name was Genevieve, is now Mrs. Vinton Haworth.

Virginia, her mother recalls, simply adored school. She really loved to "do lessons." She would refuse to go to bed and she would even refuse to be read to or played games with until her problems were all done, her spelling and reading perfect. Arithmetic was her bugaboo but she never, says her mother, let it lick her. She would wrestle with it valiantly, tongue protruding her small cheek, until she had got her answers and proven them. She was especially interested in geography. She loved anything that had to do with travel, anything that told her of foreign lands and peoples. She would spend long absorbed hours poring over maps and one of her favorite possessions was a globe of the world. She took many a long and venturesome journey on that globe with the tracing tip of her finger.

She loved poetry. She loved to have it read aloud to her—even wrote some herself. There were no evidences, her mother reports, of an Edna St. Vincent Millay in her. Ginger was not a child prodigy in any sense of the word. She was just a very regular, rather tomboy little girl. Which is the way Mrs. Rogers wanted her to be. Not until Ginger actually took the ribbons in her own hands, so to speak, and literally Charlestoned out of Texas, with her mother in tow, did Mrs. Rogers ever remotely dream of a career for her. Instead Lela wanted a career for herself so that Ginger could go to school and to college, marry and settle down.

"Ginger," her mother went on, "was more a creature of hobbies than of habits or plans. She always had, as she still has, one hobby after another. To each in turn she gives lavishly of heart and interest. When she was about seven her hobby was dolls—an assortment of them. The only doll-stipulation was that they had to be tiny. And for each midget she labored over complete wardrobes, with every accessory included, even to tiny, hand-hemmed hankies, almost finger-nail size."

She gave up dolls for—fudge. Not because of the gustatory delights of fudge but because she wanted to earn money and help her Mackey. So Virginia Katherine and Maurine, her best friend, set themselves up in business.

Through Mervyn LeRoy's urging, Ginger took a small part in "Gold Diggers of 1933." Below you see her in a scene from the musical with Warren William. It helped her career considerably.

Just one sentence from "Young Man of Manhattan" brought Ginger fame, "Cigarette me, Big Boy!" Norman Foster was the "Big Boy."

They made their own fudge from their own special recipe. They delivered it by hand to their customers, riding on bicycles. There were weeks when they took in as much as three dollars. In a short time business was so good that it lost its challenge for Ginger. And with the illogical impulse which is still hers, she jumped from commerce into Art.

It was later, in Fort Worth, Texas, that Ginger began her passionate, persistent thumping on the piano. After several weeks of bearing with this her mother, in self-defense, employed a teacher. Nor was it only a measure of self-defense. Lela knew that her child had no ear for music. She couldn't tell just what this passionate concentration on the piano might mean. She might be harboring an angel of the ivories unawares. Thus the teacher—and then, for over three months, Ginger all but slept at the piano. She did eat her breakfasts there before leaving for school. Friends nodded sage heads—an infant Paderewski, they omened, had been born into their midst.

CAME THE night of Ginger's first recital. With outward confidence, if inward tremors, the child mounted the platform and rendered McDowell's "To a Water Lily." The rafters in the Fort Worth op'ry house shivered with applause. The six more remaining "pieces" were then delivered, thunderously, the child bowed gravely to the tumultuous audience and—never touched a piano again.

And it is significant to note here that all through her childhood Ginger danced in the bathtub (with a total result of incalculable bumps, bruises and black-and-blues), danced on front porch steps, danced on the school playgrounds, danced on her bed. It is almost as though these other hobbies were experiments which her agile, exploring nature tried out and discarded, the while the real pattern of her life ran consistently, persistently, like water under ground.

The hobbies of Ginger rode on apace. There was the time, later, when Ginger and her mother were on tour with "Ginger and Her Redheads" that toys became the hobby of the hour. All kinds of toys—dolls, games, an iron bear that weighed pounds, in fact every gadget marketed by the dime stores of the country. There was also, remembered Mrs. Rogers a little wearily, Frekus. Frekus was a Turkish doll, half as big as Ginger herself, so big that she couldn't be packed in anything. So Ginger carried her herself.

And since then, there have been badminton, golf, tennis —with Ginger going on voracious shopping orgies, staggering home laden with golf clubs, badminton sets, racquets, volley balls, medicine balls, tennis equipment, monopoly, parchesi—all in due and lavish sequence as one hobby gives right of way to another.

By the rich diversity of her hobbies, by the abundant zest and eagerness she brings to each and every one of them, could be traced the whole life history, the development and the psychology of the girl. Her hobbies would be all an eminent psychiatrist would need to know about Ginger.

And the same ever-moving life within her prevents her, in her work, from being typed. It is the rich and restless variability of her nature that prompts her to demand that she do so many dancing pictures a year with Fred Astaire and so many straight dramatic roles a year on her own.

BUT TO go back again to the small Ginger who loved school, wrote poetry and collected dolls. She loved, especially, to recite poetry to her mother. She learned by heart most of the "Child's Garden of Verse," the poems of Eugene Field and Whitcomb Riley. First, and best of all, she loved "Hiawatha." She always wore a feather in her hair when she delivered this.

At this time, too, Lela's ambition to write began to focus itself. Mrs. Owens fitted up the attic as a studio for her daughter and there, with small Virginia industriously sewing her dolls' clothes and muttering her poems over to herself, under her breath, Lela wrote a scenario called "The Honor System." For Lela, just then, had begun to

A contract with Pathe took her to Hollywood. "Suicide Fleet" with Bill Boyd was one of the first films she made there.

Ginger made two pictures with Joe E. Brown. The first one was "The Tenderfoot" in which you see them both at right above.

Mervyn LeRoy helped Ginger greatly in her screen career. Hollywood insisted their friendship was love, but both married other people.

Who can forget "Flying Down to Rio"? It started the Fred Astaire-Ginger Rogers rage. Here they are with Gene Raymond.

Such giddy antics as this whirled Ginger and Fred to dizzier heights in "The Gay Divorcee." Edward Everett Horton, Ginger and Alice Brady are pictured here.

focus on Hollywood as the ultimate market for her writings. Never for Ginger did the mother think of Hollywood—only for herself.

And this first story, "Honor System," was the beginning of the trail which led to Hollywood. It was a strange trail. For when it was done Lela, shrewdly, sent it to prison wardens and governors of adjoining states—to the men who could best and most practically judge of its value, its authenticity. She sent it to, among others, a prisoner in the Arizona State Prison, an editor by the name of Eitinge, who was still editing his magazine from behind prison bars. And he wrote her an encouraging, stimulating letter. He told her that she was years ahead of her time, in her vision, in her projected plans for the honor system. This letter was the first of many.

Another who wrote to her, showing keen interest, was J. J. Saunders, prison censor. When she wrote him that she would like to go to Hollywood to write for the movies, he wrote back that he had friends in Hollywood and would give her letters to William Fox, Raoul Walsh and others. But hope ran ahead of practicability this time. For Lela realized that she had not the money to make the trip nor to finance herself after she got there. She wrote and explained to Mr. Saunders why she was not going, why she could not take advantage of his kind interest.

And then occurred one of those beneficences which are so heartening in that they prove that the human race does "help one another" now and again, just because of belief in a fellow creature or an impersonal desire to hold out the helping hand. For Mr. Saunders, multimillionaire, who had never laid eyes on Lela Rogers, and did not have any idea that she was small, fair or blue-eyed, more beautiful than Ginger has ever been—advanced her the money, financed the trip.

Ginger was five when her mother went to California. They were separated for a year. During that time the child remained with Grandmother and Grandfather Owens and the young Aunt Jean. She wrote daily letters to her Mackey, understanding, with the common sense which is Ginger's today, that what must be must be, and why.

In Hollywood, as six years before in Independence, Lela met with rare good fortune. Fox films bought "Honor System" as a title. Subsequently they used the title, too, though the story was entirely changed. And in the course of that first year she worked and wrote for Mr. Horkheimer of the old Balboa Studio. There were gathered so many of the famed of yesterday: Roscoe Arbuckle, the genial and generous; Lillian Lorraine, Ruth Roland and Henry King who was an ace director then as now.

In a short time the enterprising Lela quit Horkheimer to work for Fox. She wrote a story for Theda Bara and one for Gladys Brockwell. Then she began to write for Baby Marie Osborne, the Shirley Temple of her day. When Baby Marie became a corporation, Lela was sent for and asked to write exclusively for the child. She resigned from her Fox commitments and when the "corporation" saw fit for her to write in New York, she entrained for the East, picking up the small Ginger en route.

For Ginger it was, by this time. A small cousin, Phyllis Fraser, who could not quite get her tongue around the four syllables of the name Virginia had, with infant inspiration of which she was all unaware, named her Ginger.

Ginger was, at this age, her mother freely and laughingly admits, a freckle-faced, gangling little youngster, all knees and elbows and rust-red hair—and with so few pretensions even to mere prettiness that, when Lela met one of her old beaux again after several years and proudly displayed her progeny, the old beau said with truth if not tact, "Oh, is that it?"

MOTHER LELA also discovered that her unruffled infant had developed something of a redheaded temper. The prompt maternal action in checking this development has a deal to do, I daresay, with the enormous popularity of the Ginger of today. For when, on the first occasion, Ginger defied her mother and then threw herself on the floor, screaming and kicking, her mother promptly slapped her face.

Ginger, it transpired, had been reading fairy tales at that time. And she had read how proud and royal ladies always turned the other cheek in such humiliating circumstances. Whereupon she rose from the floor and suiting the action to the word announced, "I turn my other cheek!" Mrs. Rogers took full and instant advantage of this crowning, if comical, impertinence by smacking "the other cheek" soundly and more roundly than she had smacked the first. Ginger never lost her temper again. And it may interest parents who fear the after effects of Spartan discipline to know that Ginger says she is very grateful to her mother for that memorable lesson.

"Twenty Million Sweethearts" was the extravagant title of the picture which Dick Powell and Ginger made together.

Here's a special shot for the gents! Ginger's lovely limbs as revealed in a scene from "Sitting Pretty" with Jack Oakie.

In New York, Lela took quarters for herself and Ginger at the Hotel Bristol. Ginger went to public school on 46th Street, next door to where her mother worked. Everyone in the Bristol became her personal friend—the guests of the house, the chef, the manager, the bellboys and the chambermaids.

Ginger's first little sortie into pictures marks an amusing milestone in her life and, incidentally, in the annals of the movies. It came about in this way. Lela came home from work at the Fox Studio in New York one day to find a note saying that Mr. Burton George (director) and Lela's friend, had taken the baby over to the Fort Lee Studio, in New Jersey, to work in a picture. Lela was furious. She didn't want her little girl in the movies. How dared he put such notions into the child's head? Although Lela, who was writing for and so capably managing the then-thriving career of Baby Marie Osborne, hadn't the faintest idea of her own little girl doing likewise.

When, that evening, Director George brought Ginger home, telling the mother rampant that she had worked all day in a George Walsh picture, he was told that that was the beginning and the end of Virginia Katherine McMath's screen career! Mr. George protested. Ginger would have to go back the next day, he said. They needed her to carry on the scenes she had begun. If she didn't appear it would mean that they would have to destroy all the film shot that day and begin all over again with another child, which would be both bothersome and expensive. But Lela remained adamant. She was sorry. Had she been consulted Mr. Walsh and his company now would not be subjected mained adamant. She was sorry. Had she been consulted and her child would never again appear in pictures.

And so, the first reels of film ever made of Ginger Rogers were deposited in the waste-basket.

THEN THE War hit the world. Lela Rogers saw flags wave, saw the boys marching off, heard the anthems of the Allies resounding in the streets and—enlisted with the Marines! She was on twenty-four-hour call, so in the first twenty-four hours after enlisting, she sent young Ginger back home again, to Grandmother Owens in Kansas City.

Lela went to Washington and served as clerk in the Headquarters of the Marine Corps. While there, she wrote a story for the Marines' magazine which led her Colonel to say to her, "Why did you enlist as a clerk?" And then and there he transferred her to a department where her writing and reporting abilities would be utilized. There, in company with Courtney Riley Cooper, the artist Leyendecker, and other notables of the pen and brush, she worked during the remainder of the War.

Each and every day there arrived a letter from young Ginger. Not one day in all that time did the daily letter fail to appear, and in the same morning mail. To everyone in her department, though the nations of the world were at war, Lela Leibrand (which was the name she used at that time) showed these letters, until she became everywhere known as "Mother Leibrand."

She was, later, handed the cutting and titling of pictures brought from overseas. And the stories she did in conjunction with her other activities—reporting everything from political cabals to crimes passionel, stories which were widely syndicated—brought her, when the Armistice came and she was discharged from duty, an offer from a Baltimore syndicate. She had to refuse it. Her vigorous health, her abounding vitality in so tiny a frame (she only comes about to Ginger's shoulder) was at last depleted. She was sent back home to her mother and to her small daughter on the flat of her back.

Shortly thereafter occurred the next most significant milestone in the lives of Lela and Ginger Rogers. For back home in Kansas City, Lela met John Rogers, who had been a childhood sweetheart. And they were married. Ginger, at the time, was a bit over seven. The marriage lasted for seven years and was the real marriage, the only deep love of Lela Rogers' life.

John Rogers was an insurance broker and his business took him, shortly after his marriage, to Fort Worth, Texas, so that once again, Lela and Ginger returned to the Lone Star State.

There followed several happy, normal years for Ginger. She loved John Rogers with a devotion which he warmly and deeply returned. Now, the editor of a paper, he frequently refers to Ginger as "my daughter." She was not his daughter in the accepted sense of the word; she was his daughter in love and congeniality and respect. She took his name then and has used it ever since, greatly to his pride and satisfaction. They still correspond. And John Rogers, though married again, to another childhood sweetheart, follows Ginger's career consistently.

It was through the music that John Rogers wrote in those days, when he was first married to Lela, that Ginger was inspired to become interested in singing. Now and again, there in Fort Worth, they used to appear on the radio together—half-hour programmes during which they sang the music he had written and other popular songs.

At about this time, too, Ginger had her first beau. Charlie Cartwright was his name and the adolescent "romance" was conducted thus: Ginger would stand on her front porch. Charlie would stand on his front porch. Charlie would manage to become articulate enough to say something, after which he would blush a fiery brick red. Ginger would gulp several times and become articulate enough to answer him, after which she would blush a fiery, sunset red. This state of affairs continued, without notable development, until Ginger left Fort Worth.

LELA, MEANWHILE, was again with a paper. She was holding the twin position of dramatic and society editor of the Fort Worth Record. And also, drawing upon her experiences in Hollywood, she wrote plays for the Fort Worth Central High School (which Ginger was attending) and Ginger frequently played the leading parts. Her first dramatic appearance on any stage was in "The Death of St. Dennis," a three-act play which her mother wrote, drawing its theme from Texan history. Ginger played the wife of that historic figure.

Lela Rogers, as has been said, was society and dramatic editor of the Fort Worth Record. As dramatic editor her duties took her, frequently, backstage. And with her went Ginger. And to Ginger, as to every imaginative boy and girl, "backstage" was a place of mystery in which moved magic shapes and other-world sounds.

So, while Lela sought news, Ginger sought adventure. All unconsciously, young Ginger breathed deeply the mingled odors of grease-paint, powder and moth balls—and she loved it. She explored stage and loft, wings and dressing-rooms and orchestra pit. For long hours, hidden in the wings, she watched hoofers rehearse their complicated routines, create new steps, over and over and over again. And some of that patience and tirelessness must stand by her now when, for hours upon hours, she and Fred Astaire work today. And this, she has often admitted, did thrill her. She would feel the narrow soles of her own feet twitching, a sensation as though "little wings were groping," she said. Rhythm runs in her veins along with her blood.

It was during those backstage excursions that Ginger met Santry and Seymour. She liked them enormously. And they liked the slender child, just beginning to suggest that peculiarly poignant turn from awkwardness to willowiness. They were friends of Lela's, too, and so they saw a good deal of Ginger.

CAME THE time for the Charleston Contest. Both Santry and Seymour suggested that she enter it. Did they do it only to please the eager girl whose young body already swayed gracefully to the strains of dance music? Or could it be that, however subconsciously, they sensed in the young Ginger the marvelously skilled young star who dances today to world applause?

Whatever their motive, suggest it they did. And Ginger, rich with enthusiasm, took the suggestion to heart with her usual complete ardor and abandon. She wanted to dance the Charleston. She wanted to enter that contest, too, and if possible, win it. But most of all she, who had never been to dancing school in her life, wanted the fun of dancing the Charleston.

Lela Rogers, it so happened, was not present when this history-making suggestion was made. As a matter of fact, the manager of the Majestic Theatre, entering into friendly conspiracy with Ginger, made all arrangements for her to enter the contest without Mrs. Rogers' knowledge.

Then, as is the way with conspiracies, the secret leaked out. It reached Lela's ears. Lela was quite coldly and terrifyingly the reverse of enthusiastic. She proceeded to throw cold water. She pointed out, with pitiless logic, that Ginger had no clothes, that Ginger had got herself "into a pretty pickle." Ginger had the usual and requisite number of pretty party dresses, but nothing in any way suited to so important an occasion as a Charleston contest.

The situation was desperate and Ginger was frantic. Mr. Santry did not seem, at the time, to be helping when he suggested that Ginger had better show up since she was formally entered. Ginger assured him that she would move heaven and work havoc on the earth in order to get into the contest. This, it began to appear, was easy compared with the contest of wills which went on when Ginger began persuading her mother to provide a new dress for the big event.

Lela Rogers had not wanted Ginger to enter that contest. She felt the girl was too young. She felt, too, that if Ginger should win, there would be offers of vaudeville engagements. If Ginger accepted the vaudeville offers she would next, and logically, begin to consider the stage as a career. Then, her mother knew, she would be obliged to give Ginger the chance to follow her desire. Also it would mean that she would have to give up her position on the Fort Worth Record and accompany Ginger on tour, since she was too young to go alone. And, far more important, it would mean the end of all the dreams she had for Ginger, all the plans she had formed and worked so hard to make posible. It threatened Ginger's safety and peace,

Who can forget the infectious swing of the Piccolino which Fred and Ginger danced in "Top Hat"? Here they are whirling through it.

Fred Astaire gives Ginger a sample of a new Irving Berlin hit in their gay opus, "Follow the Fleet."

Ginger has one of those warm, friendly natures that embraces everything from friends to her pet Siamese cat.

which from the beginning, before the child was born, she had so terribly wanted for her.

Things came to a standstill and remained that way. Came the night before the contest. Ginger tasted despair. She had used all her pleas, said all her passionate prayers, for the first time in her life, in vain.

She could not face defeat. The latent trouper in her triumphed. She braced her failing spirit, went in to play the greatest dramatic part of her life for that loving, embattled little lioness, her mother.

SHE WAS cool, passionless, logical. She marshalled and presented her facts, bare-faced. She said that her instinct told her that this was her "chance"—and not only to win a Charleston contest. All that she was to be, she said, rested now on her mother's ultimatum—to buy or not to buy a dress.

And when she had done, she also had won. Her mother sensed that the child was battling for an essential now. And so, with few words, but graciously admitting defeat at the hand of her little girl who, overnight, was a little girl no longer, Lela Rogers hastened downtown. She bought several yards of white crepe romaine, a quantity of brilliants. She worked all night and in the morning Ginger found, spread on her bed, the alluring costume in which she won the Charleston Contest and—danced her way to the side of Fred Astaire.

Perhaps that first white gown was the forerunner of the one white gown, or white and silver gown, which Ginger insists upon wearing in at least one dance number of every picture she makes. Save for that established rule that there be one white gown, Ginger wears any color—except red. She is especially fond of blue, green or brown for tailored clothes. She loves pretty clothes, but has often said she would despise to be known as "The Best Dressed Woman in Hollywood." She has a habit of getting one dress she especially likes and wearing it until it is worn out. Other frocks, in the meantime, will hang in her closet until they are completely out of style. She doesn't like clothes that are stylized or freakish or the least bit faddish.

She never wears make-up on the street, save for a trace of lipstick. She uses a specially prepared face oil in place of powder and is always sufficiently sun-tanned so that she doesn't need to use rouge, which she detests. She is the most natural-looking star in Hollywood, with the possible exception of Maureen O'Sullivan. For the very good reason that she is natural, she seldom wears jewelry. When she is working, she always wears overalls or slacks (item: $1.00) and a washable shirt (item: $1.00), plus flat-heeled sandals and a ribbon 'round her hair.

But to go back and record history: Ginger went into the contest there in Fort Worth—and won it. This was truly triumph!

AND THEN happened what Lela Rogers expected. The prize for winning the contest was four weeks with the Interstate Circuit at $100.00 a week. The momentum of that Dallas success had been such that there was, Lela recognized, no going backward. A prize had been won.

On the Interstate Circuit with them Mrs. Rogers and Ginger took two of the defeated Charleston competitors, a boy and a girl, both redheads. Lela was shrewd enough to realize that assisting talent could do no harm and maternal enough to figure that they would save Ginger's strength by staying on stage while she was changing and getting her breath. The act was billed "Ginger Rogers and Her Redheads."

It was while she was on the Interstate Circuit for a return engagement three years later that Ginger Rogers made her first marriage.

Little has ever been said, almost nothing has ever been known of this first, brief marriage. It was like this: The young husband had been a friend of Ginger's family for several years. He had been, indeed, a beau of that young Aunt Jean with whom Ginger had first gone to school back in Kansas City. "It was one of those things," Ginger told me, "where they practically used to give me dimes and quarters to leave the room." The young man had paid no attention then to the little niece who was always in the way. The only attention he had paid her was to get her out of the way. But Ginger, adolescent, had paid him considerable and idealizing attention.

She dreamed that "some day when she was grown up . . ." And then the "some day" came, in Dallas, Texas. She wasn't very grown-up, even then. But she was on the stage.

And so they met again and, three weeks later, were married in New Orleans, Ginger had a three-week- lay-off and then, after that brief honeymoon, reported back for work. Theirs was a travelling marriage. They never made a home together, and they separated after ten months.

THE CAREER, meanwhile, was pyramiding. From Memphis, Ginger went to St. Louis where, for thirty-two weeks, she headlined a show with Eddie Lowry. She went then to the Oriental Theatre in Chicago to sing and dance to the music of Paul Ash. After an eighteen-weeks run, Paul Ash went to New York.

Came, eventually, a call from Paul Ash asking Ginger to join him at the Paramount Theatre in Brooklyn. She accepted. On the day she accepted there came a call from Kalmar and Ruby, who were about to produce a musical. They wanted a comedienne.

Ginger opened in "Top Speed." She was, she admits, a little frightened, not a little impressed to be in musical comedy which was "the tops" to her. She did a little self-pinching to verify the fantastic fact.

It was while she was in "Top Speed," however, that she made her first movie, "Young Man of Manhattan," with Claudette Colbert and Norman Foster. This was the picture in which she played the famous vamp-flapper role (it took her two years to live that down) and in which she spoke the oft-quoted line, "Cigarette me, Big Boy." She was tag-lined with that line for months.

She made five pictures for Paramount, in New York. She did some radio work over the Rudy Vallee program. And—she played a lead in "Girl Crazy," her second musical comedy on Broadway.

"Then, when my show closed, I got a wire to come to Hollywood to do pictures for Pathé," said Ginger.

It was at about this time that Ginger met Director Mervyn LeRoy and the friendship which lasted for more than two years began. And it was Mervyn LeRoy, Ginger admits today, who was largely responsible for the next upward steps of her career. They went everywhere together. Never a column that didn't include their linked names; never a party which they did not attend together. It was, or so Hollywood thought, a romance that would, inevitably, culminate at the altar. It didn't.

DURING THE time of her friendship with Mervyn LeRoy, Ginger went to Warner Brothers and made "42nd Street," "Gold Diggers of 1933" and others. The pictures were due, without doubt, she says, to Mervyn LeRoy's influence.

She's a great hobbyist and one of them happens to be tennis.

There were a couple of pictures at Fox and then free-lancing, with one or two independents, and a picture at Universal called, ironically, "Don't Bet on Love"—for Ginger made it with Lew Ayres. It was after that picture that Ginger signed a three-picture contract with RKO-Radio. And there began the reel roster which has put her on the box-office throne she occupies today.

Ginger met Lew, not on the set of "Don't Bet on Love," as has been said, but at a party. It was not "love at first sight." "I do believe," Ginger told me, "that love at first sight is entirely possible, but it didn't happen that way with Lew and me. We had met, casually, several times, before we began to go out together. I liked him. I know that he liked me. But it definitely wasn't love—at first.

"The first date we ever had was the night of the big earthquake. We made a date to go downtown to see 'Of Thee I Sing.' We kept the date and during the first act the temblors began and proceeded to shake the house, to shake us right out of our seats, finally. In between acts—and quakes—we went window shopping! I should have known it was love when it never occurred to me that the gigantic buildings might, at any moment, topple down on our hapless heads and extinguish both love and life! After the theatre, we decided to drive down to Long Beach to see the devastated areas, but we were stopped by the police so we went back home, to my house, and made coffee and sandwiches, got Mother out of bed and sat around, talking until dawn.

"We had a lot of fun together—for a time," Ginger said, her blue eyes reminiscent. "We were always doing crazy things or crazy things were always happening to us. Like the time Lew lost his top hat going up the steps of the church the day we were married, with the fans looking on. And just before the ceremony, as I was driving to Pasadena, all beruffled and afraid to take a deep breath lest one of the ruffles wrinkle, I beheld my bridegroom and his best man, Ben Alexander, perched on stands in front of a hamburger 'jint!' 'Twas a pretty sight! We used to go on spur-of-the-moment picnics, too. We used to do fool things like driving to the desert and bumming it down there for a day and a night—often visiting old deserted gold mines and playing we were prospectors or something. No telling what we'd do, or when or how . . ."

You fans still trip to the catchy tunes of "Swing Time" wherever you go to dance. This dancing school scene with Ginger trying to teach Fred Astaire to dance was a riot.

Ginger and Lew were married in the Church of the Flowers, in Pasadena, the following November. And no girl ever entered a marriage with a more profound hope for its success, a more abiding faith in its beauty than did Ginger on that November day.

Then things went wrong. Two years later that marriage made in Heaven was sundered here on earth. And that the sundering was painful and has left a residue of pain, is evident in the quieter voices and graver eyes of the girl and boy who came out of that marriage not quite the same.

There have been many "explanations," many theories, more surmises and gossip about the "why" of their separation. Hollywood took its somewhat unholy interest in the affairs, the home life, the well-being, or the reverse, of the limelighted young couple. And that was probably one of the causes. They didn't have a chance. They didn't have privacy. They had the "audience reaction" throughout.

They were, when they were first married, in quite different positions, professionally, from those occupied when they came to the parting of the ways. For when they were married, Ginger was not the tops as she is today and—Lew was a big star. Then the screen scene see-sawed, as it has a habit of doing. Ginger began her amazing career. She teamed with Fred Astaire, but Lew was not working as steadily any more. It is a tribute to Lew, and not the reverse, to assume that perhaps he couldn't quite take it. He, like many before him, could not endure being called a "Mister Ginger Rogers," even in the good clean fun with which those things are said.

Ginger's activities increased with her mounting fame. She spent long hours, days, weeks, rehearsing with Fred Astaire. She tapped and routined her way through dinner hours, holidays, birthdays and anniversaries. There was no more time for expeditions to the desert, for suddenly planned picnics. No time to share Lew's interest in astronomy; no time to share his hobbies and pursuits. There was, actually, no time to be a wife.

LEW AND Ginger were, I think, psychologically mismated. Ginger is gay and warm and friendly. Lew, on the other hand, is quiet, reserved, ultra-studious, not adjustable, not what is commonly known as "a good mixer." They might have adjusted their differences; they might have worked out the problem which was themselves if they had had the time. They didn't have it and they didn't have the privacy.

Ginger told me, "My mother once said a very wise thing. She said, 'You can eliminate everything from a marriage, if you can laugh alike.'" There came the time when Ginger and Lew couldn't laugh alike. They didn't share enough things to laugh at.

"And so," Ginger told me, eyes a little wistful, "I shall just drift along for a time. We are not divorced as yet. That will come soon. I have no marital plans for the future, but none whatsoever. I go out with Jimmy Stewart now and then, with other boys occasionally.

"I may marry again, someday, if that love comes to me. I shall certainly never give up my career.

"I am drifting, romantically; I am working very hard, professionally. I hope and intend to make one or two dramatic pictures a year instead of all dancing pictures. Mother and I are building a home on Beverly Crest—a sort of stylized farmhouse, I'd call it. It's very small, sort of rambling and homey and fun.

"I just live each day as it comes, do the best I can with it, watch it die without regret. I put what is past away."

Exhaustive tests over a long period prove absolutely that our New Cutex Polish will not peel or chip in a week! The reason is simple.

We took a picture of our New Cutex Polish right after it had been applied to a smooth surface. And we took pictures of 8 other popular brands of nail polish, also immediately after application.

The photographs showed an amazing difference. Look at them above—magnified 18 times.

Notice the perfectly smooth, even finish of Cutex under the microscope! Cutex will stay unmarred on the nail for days. Now look at the rough, bumpy, uneven finish of the ordinary polish. The lines in the picture show clearly that the polish formula is imperfectly balanced. They show the beginning of cracking and peeling—10 minutes after the polish dries!

Big Saving . . . It's easy to see how much you can save in time and money if you wear the New Cutex Polish . . . with its glass-like, wonderfully resistant finish. You can put on the New Cutex and forget about it for a week. And its lustre will be higher, too, because of its smoother, longer wearing surface.

Remember, too—the New Cutex Polish is famous for its new smoky shades. And it's usable to the last drop—never thickens in the bottle.

He Has a Private Life

sun but Ian Hunter. He made no effort to be mysterious, but he gracefully changed the subject when it happened to be himself; he deftly parried my questions; he effectually blocked every attempt to get beneath the surface.

After lunch I returned to the publicity department and demanded to know something about Ian Hunter, but a thorough canvass of the bell ringers brought forth the same answer: "We don't know him."

Ten years ago an actor of this type wouldn't have stood a chance in Hollywood, but today a new type of actor is catching the fancy of the public and Mr. Hunter is a fair example. He isn't an attention-getter off the screen; he isn't a great lover and he isn't good copy. He seems to avoid publicity.

For instance, upon his arrival in Hollywood he was put immediately to work in "Midsummer Night's Dream," in which he played Theseus, Duke of Athens. When the picture was finished, the studio heads thought it an excellent opportunity to introduce him to the public as the Master of Ceremonies at the gala premiere of this picture. In the advertising and in the program Mr. Hunter was billed in that capacity. The only thing they forgot to do was to consult Mr. Hunter about it until the day of the opening, when they mentioned it to him.

"But I can't do it," he said flatly. "I'm no good at that sort of thing."

That was that. No amount of persuasion would induce him to change his mind. What any other actor, particularly a newcomer to Hollywood, would have considered a great opportunity, Mr. Hunter shunned as he would a bill collector. He is an actor who is content to rely entirely on his ability in a business where, until very recently, almost any other quality than a talent for acting would help a player to success. He cannot be unaware of the value of publicity, but a natural reserve plus a definite talent—probably a heritage from his Scotch ancestry—for saving words makes him definitely no help to a publicity department. He makes no effort to be seen about where "the crowd" dines and dances. In fact, he even lives as far as he can from Hollywood at Santa Monica by the sea. But in spite of being deficient in publicity angles, he has made rapid and consistent strides toward stardom since he arrived in Hollywood.

IT was my impression, which I verified later, that Mr. Hunter was an important actor on the stage in England. I wondered how it happened that he would give up stardom there to come to Hollywood and play secondary roles in pictures. In many pictures he has been content to be the best friend of the star.

"It's a simple matter of arithmetic," he explained. "I can earn as much in Hollywood in a year as I can on the stage in England in a lifetime. I want to make as much money as I can. I have a family to take care of, two children to educate. The theatrical profession is a peculiar business. One minute you are on top. The next minute you may be out. You don't know why or when you are going to be through. While I'm on top it's fine. I'm preparing for the time when I won't be. I'm holding onto my money. It goes into the bank every week. I want to work as long as I can but when there is no more work for me, I want to be prepared to step out gracefully and have a feeling of security."

His father was a wine merchant in Cape Town, South Africa, where Ian was born, and his youth was particularly carefree and happy. He had no ambition for a career of any kind but was very interested in having a good time.

His one ambition then, and one which he still has, was to sail on and swim in all the different waters of the world. His record to date is quite imposing. During his boyhood he swam in the tepid waters of the Indian Ocean in the morning and in the icy waters of the South Atlantic in the afternoon. They were less than twenty miles apart. He attended high school at Grahamstown, South Africa, and went on to college at Aldenham in Hertfordshire, England. While there he explored all the waters about the British Isles and those of France, Spain and Germany.

Probably the most dramatic event of his life occurred during the War. He had been given leave and, of course, rushed to Paris to have a good time. One evening, when meeting a group of people for the first time, he suddenly heard himself being introduced to his own brother.

"It was like meeting a stranger," he told me. "My brother had left home when I was too young to remember him at all. We were both very surprised and we both felt very strange about it. He was on leave, too, and we spent the remainder of our holiday getting acquainted."

Indirectly, it was the World War that caused Ian Hunter to become an actor. The war had stopped his education before he had decided on his life work and the end of the war found him unprepared to earn a living at any profession.

One day an actors' manager in London looked up to see Hunter, a youth of nineteen, standing in his office. The boy had just received his discharge from the army and, naturally, was out of a job.

"I want to go on the stage," he announced, with all the confidence of youth.

QUESTIONING brought out the fact that he had no experience as an actor. In fact, it had never occurred to him before that he wanted to be an actor. His two older brothers, Kenneth and Colin, had been very successful in the theatre before the war and had resumed their work after getting out of the army. It seemed to this boy that it was a good racket to get into.

The agent knew of the family, knew the boy's background. He also knew the scarcity of "white collar" jobs at the time, but he hesitated.

"Will you get me a job on the stage?" young Hunter persisted.

"Don't do it, my young man, don't do it," the agent advised kindly. "Go back to school or you'll regret it all your life."

"But he got me a job in a play and I played half a dozen different parts in it," Hunter told me. He never left the stage from that time on, except to make a few pictures in England, until he came to Hollywood. He toured the Provinces with stock companies and later became one of London's popular matinee idols.

Ten years ago Mr. Hunter married Casha Pringle, former English actress, and they have two sons—Jolyon, aged nine, and Robin, aged six.

"Jolyon has definitely decided to be an actor," Mr. Hunter said, "and he must be serious for he hasn't changed his mind in a year. He thinks he'd like to be an actor because they make a lot of money," he laughed.

"Just now I'm more interested in teaching them both to swim in the surf and sail a boat," he added.

The Hunters live always on or near the water. "I feel that I've lost something when I'm not near some kind of water," he explained. "And it's quiet there," he added, admitting that his pet hate is noise of any description.

He is so rabid about noise he refuses to have a radio in the house and even the telephone bells have been removed and replaced by a light that blinks when there is a call on the wire. In this home, too, there is a soundproof room, in which Mr. Hunter reads and writes.

When it comes to race horses and good wines, Mr. Hunter forgets his Scotch ancestry, but he economizes by turning off lights and he is saving his vacations until enough have accumulated to enable him to take a long sea voyage. Mr. H. doesn't believe in the skimpy holidays which most stars have to be contented with.

A few years ago a young Basque sailor tied up his sixteen-foot boat to the Battery wall in New York and announced that he had crossed the Atlantic Ocean—all alone in his small boat. He had arrived unheralded. Putting out from Lisbon, Portugal, he had negotiated the treacherous waters of the Atlantic in three months via the northern route.

The day after his story had been verified, the young man was famous. Among the congratulatory cables he received was one from Ian Hunter, at that time a star on the London stage. This cable read: "You have done what has been my life's ambition. Congratulations."

SO don't be too surprised, when his vacations have accrued, to hear some day of Mr. Hunter starting out on such a trip. He will not attempt to make the crossing alone, however, and says he would choose for his companion in such a voyage, Erling Tambs, noted Norwegian sailor and adventurer.

Differing from most actors, who clamor for more publicity, Ian Hunter even complains about the nature of squibs printed about him. There was the very amusing incident concerning his mongrel dog, Hamish, who became very seasick on the way over from England. His master gave him a bit of champagne, which is considered a sure cure for mal de mer. The champagne cured the dog of seasickness, but left him with an incurable taste for wine.

"I wish they hadn't printed that story," Mr. Hunter remonstrated.

"Why, isn't it true?" I asked him.

"Oh, yes," he said, "it's true, but it's so silly."

Again, upon his arrival in Hollywood he discovered that a reputation for being the "handsomest man in England" had preceded him here, and he was no end upset and embarrassed. However, the rumor proved to be no boomerang and experts are inclined to agree that he fulfilled all expectations. His work since he has been here doesn't leave you wondering why he was a favorite in England.

He is regarded by his co-workers as amiable, without temperament, as Warner Baxter said, "a grand guy."

If you'd like to get acquainted with this man whom "nobody knows," just try asking him a few questions about himself. He knows all the answers: "yes" and "no."

She Does as She Pleases

and as far as she is concerned it is seven in the morning.

There is a story told to this effect: Patsy was hours late for an important business appointment with her New York agent. Knowing her, everyone in the office sighed with resignation and waited. Finally a telephone call came in from her. Before taking the call the agent turned to a friend and remarked, "I'll bet you a dollar she'll ask what time it is," and took the call. Patsy's first words were, "Say, what day is this?"

Everyone knows pretty thoroughly the story of her childhood. She has made no secret of her background. She describes it in this way. "I just escaped being born in Ireland. My three sisters were born before we came over and only my brother and I were born here. One of my sisters, I've never seen. She's still in Ireland and lives in County Mayo. She owns eight pubs." No covering up the truth and building a phony but glittering press story here. Her sister owns some "pubs" and that's exactly what Patsy tells. She interrupted her story to say, "I think I'm going over next year." She winks an eye and clicks her tongue against her cheek in pleasant anticipation. "Boy, won't I have fun!

"We were what you'd call poor, but we never missed any meals. We went without shoes, but mother always set a good table. We lived in a tenement, but we were given ten cents a week for a movie." She added with Irish appreciation for a sly one, "I never spent it for that, though. I always climbed over the fence."

When Patsy was around eight, and in the third grade, her mother managed to send her to dancing school. What denials that must have entailed! Patsy repaid her by working frantically and by the time she was twelve she was teaching dancing for Jack Blue. She continued to teach until she was fifteen when her brother got a job dancing in a Frank Fay show.

Patsy went down to the theatre to help him with his routine. Frank Fay noticed her and told her to report for work on the following Monday. Patsy was on the job believing that she was to work with her brother. She was wrong—the brother had been fired and she worked alone.

That was a good start and it would be easy to imagine that all was smooth sailing from then on. But such was not the case. Patsy was no beauty. She could not wear stunning clothes nor glide with the grace of a queen. The breaks did not come easy and it was a long hard grind from there to the Hal Roach studio where they are now grooming her for stardom.

Recently I was on the set watching Patsy and Lyda Roberti make their new picture, "Nobody's Baby." They were working with a new-born baby in the private room of a hospital, supposedly.

There is a soft streak in every person with the blood of Erin in her veins and Patsy is no exception. This was revealed in the tender way in which she looked at and handled the tiny baby. Her eyes were dark and lustrous and her voice was as deep and mellow as the soft, crooning voice of a mother as she cradled him in her arms. The camera ground on, Patsy spoke her lines, and all the time her hand was patting—patting soothingly—the tiny back.

She and Lyda are playing student nurses who become involved in a night club mystery. They solve it and, of course, get themselves into and out of many scrapes.

Lyda Roberti joined us and our conversation turned to the tough assignment Lyda had when she stepped into the spot left vacant by the death of Thelma Todd. Patsy said, "She's doing a grand job and it's been plenty tough. It wasn't a cinch stepping into Thelma's place."

At the mention of Thelma's name Patsy's mood changed to one of depression. No one could have thought more of Thelma than The Kelly. They had been close friends for years. They respected each other not only as troupers but as individuals. Thelma, with her cool, blonde beauty and fine education was a contrasting foil for the voluble and rowdy Kelly. Yet they had hilarious times together, off-screen as well as on. They had teamed together for so long that there was never any difficulty with their scenes. They clicked.

Under the circumstances it would have been natural and human if Patsy had been impatient and critical of Lyda. It would have been understandable had she covered up her sorrow at losing Thelma by being bitter toward the one who took her place. But that's not The Kelly. She saw Lyda's position. She put her at ease, and rehearsed hours off-set with her to make their work smooth.

In speaking of Lyda, Patsy said, "She's very funny. You see, it's simple because Lyda, with her dialect, is so entirely different. She doesn't understand all the English words and that makes for comedy and it's easy to get laughs. The only change is that, where Thelma used to play straight and I did the foil, the positions are reversed—I play straight and Lyda does the foil."

Patsy can't be serious long and she shook herself out of her somber mood and began to squirm. Suddenly she shouted, including everyone within sound of her voice, "Anyone want a soda? Speak up. Come on, let's go over and get a drink." Seven of us trailed over to the studio cafe.

We distributed ourselves on high stools and ordered. Patsy kept up a running fire of hilariously funny comments about her father whom she refers to as "The Sheik of Eighty-eighth and Columbus," as we drank our drinks.

Finished, Patsy began to search through various pockets and down the front of her uniform for her money. It could not be found. While she fumbled, becoming wilder and wilder, Joe from the casting office, wearing a long-suffering air, paid the check, barely making it from small change in his pocket.

Patsy was off the stool, her hair disordered, frantically making a last desperate search as she muttered, "Now, I had that. What'dya suppose I did with it. I didn't eat it. Well—" Her voice broke off as she touched the money in her most convenient pocket, "Oh—oh, here it is. Gosh, I thought I'd lost it."

Joe said, "I paid it."

Patsy said, "You did? Well, say, that calls for another drink." She climbed back up on her stool, anchored herself to it by wrapping her legs around its base, twisted her misplaced nurse's apron from under her right ear to something near its correct position, pushed her hair back of her ears, and slumped comfortably over the drink which was put in front of her.

Patsy was "being herself," forgetful and hoydenish. She was doing as she darn well pleased.

Lines... Dry Skin ARE UNDER-SKIN FAULTS

Miss Sela Krebs: "A dry-looking skin is easy to avoid with Pond's Cold Cream."

To keep skin young looking —learn how to invigorate your UNDER SKIN

Hard to believe—but those little lines that look as if they'd been creased into your skin from the outside, actually begin underneath!

First, hundreds of little cells, fibres and blood vessels underneath begin to function poorly. Then, the under tissues sag. That's what makes your outside skin fall into creases.

The same way with dull, dry skin! It's little oil glands underneath that function faultily—and rob your outside skin of the oil it needs to keep it supple, young looking.

But think!—You can invigorate those failing under tissues! You can start those faulty oil glands functioning busily again. That's why you need not be discouraged when lines and skin dryness begin.

Miss Eleanor Roosevelt

daughter of Mrs. Henry Latrobe Roosevelt of Washington, D. C., says: "A treatment with Pond's Cold Cream whisks away tired lines—and tones my skin."

Start to rouse your underskin with Pond's "deep-skin" treatments. Soon you'll see lines smoothing out, skin getting supple, young looking again.

Every night, pat Pond's Cold Cream into your skin. Its specially processed fine oils go deep, loosen dirt and make-up. Wipe it all off. Now the rousing treatment—more Pond's Cold Cream briskly patted in. Feel the blood tingling! Your skin is glowing . . . softer. Feels toned already! You are waking up that underskin.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat. Your skin is smooth for powder.

Do this regularly. Soon tissues grow firm again. Lines fade out. Your skin is smooth—supple. It looks years younger!

Good Bad Man

youngster, to see the stage stars who came to San Francisco. Many of them hailed from there, and she knew some of them personally. That was how I first got the urge, I suppose."

However, it took years for the footlight fever to develop into a rash.

"For five years, I went to Santa Clara Academy. About the only play ever presented there was 'The Bells.' I had the lead in that, and called myself an actor."

He finished high school at Santa Clara, meanwhile winning "a bunch of elocution contests." One of the awards was a medal, which he later lost in a fight. Then, for a year he went to "coaching school"—apparently a localism for "preparatory school"—and entered Stanford University.

Lloyd had a cousin, a great athlete, who threatened to "knock his block off" if he went out for football. This cousin had suffered an injury that made it painful for him either to lie down or sit down, and later cost him his life. But Lloyd disregarded the advice and tried to become Freshman fullback. Ernie Nevers, later All-American, was out for the same position. That meant that Lloyd was practically glued to the bench.

No one warned him against acting. Despite that fact, he tried out, in his Freshman year, for the Senior play. He won the lead. That led to his becoming a member of the University Players, who put on twelve plays a year, in which he did everything from melodrama to musicals. And that led, after two years, to his flunking out.

STANFORD has a rule that no flunkee can be readmitted until a year has elapsed. It was during that year of waiting around that he was first paid for acting. It happened more or less by accident.

"I started out to see the world, and with a fraternity brother, I shipped on a liner making a world cruise. I was an understudy to an officer, at a salary of twenty-five cents a month. At least, that's what it seemed like. And it took tall talking to get the job. The line had had too much experience with young cubs who quit after the first trip. Which, by the way, was what we intended to do.

"Nothing much happened on the cruise, except work, until we reached New York. The ship burned up there. My pal and I had dressed in shore clothes and had gone to a show on our first night in port. We were due back on the boat at twelve. We came in sight of the pier at ten of twelve—and were the first to see the fire.

"I rushed on board, and waved an empty hose around for about ten minutes, until I cracked wise that something was wrong with the water pressure; then headed for shore, along with a cloud of smoke.

"We had three dollars and thirty-six cents. We spent three dollars getting to the Hotel McAlpin. We expected his mother to be there and come to our rescue. But she wasn't there. That meant that, without cash or luggage, we had to try to talk ourselves into a room.

"We talked ourselves not only into a room, but a suite, with two exposures. We tipped the bellhop a quarter with a grand gesture, and had eleven cents left. We had no toothbrush, no comb, no clothes except those on our backs—we were lucky to be in shore clothes when the fire happened.

"If his mother hadn't appeared in the morning, probably the steamship line would have bailed us out. The line was big-hearted. It offered to let us work our way back to San Francisco on a freighter. We had heard about freighter food. I wired home, 'Miscalculated financial status by about five thousand miles. Please send money.' "

A month after his return home, his father died. Lloyd suddenly was strictly on his own.

With another ex-Stanfordite, who had written a skit about radio, he went into vaudeville. Lloyd was the stooge of the act—his was the voice that came out of the unpredictable microphone.

"That lasted four months," he continued. "And I didn't like it much better than I liked swabbing decks. The routine of it was deadly. We used to try to think up new lines to add to the act, but we were in such a rut that we just couldn't percolate any new ones. I'm glad I didn't stick at that."

By the end of the four months, his year away from Stanford had elapsed.

"I went back—and took any work I could get to pay my way through. I punched tickets at football games, waited on table at the fraternity house and I was a hasher. At the same time, I was still the leading man at the campus playhouse—a hero in make-believe, a menial in reality. That didn't help my self-respect any.

"And that year away hadn't made me any more studious by any means. I had lost respect for authority, for one thing. And I had a bugaboo, for another thing. It's name was chemistry. The class came at 8 A. M., which was bad enough, but I hated the smell of that room. It reminded me of medicine. One failing I have is that I can't stand medicinal odors—or talk of dissection."

A strange idiosyncrasy for a screen "bad man," who, supposedly, wouldn't stop at anything!

CHEMISTRY was supposed to be a snap course, he said. "English was supposed to be tough. Yet I pulled A's in English and F's in Chem. Until finally, President Wilbur told me, 'Your intelligence test is 'way above your marks here. You get good grades in the hard subjects, poor marks in the easy ones. Why don't you become an actor?'

"So, when I flunked out for the second and final time, I decided to take the little money I had inherited from my father and invest it in a year's test of myself as an actor. When you're in school, your family and your friends all tell you that you're marvelous. You're not so sure. You've got to find out—from colder critics.

"I came down here, with an introduction to Gilmor Brown at the Pasadena Playhouse. He was hard up for a leading man. I got the job. I was there a year, working without salary."

The only money he earned during that year was in a brief engagement with Edward Everett Horton's super-stock company, in "The Queen's Husband." That was the first time he ever played a "heavy." The character was a revolutionist.

No, he didn't give a thought to the movies—then. Because:

"I had already had one movie experience, at Stanford. Some Hollywood high-pressure promoter sold Wilbur the idea of a movie about the University, written by undergraduates and played by undergraduates. The epic was called 'Stanford Days.' It's still shown as a curiosity. The three principal characters were an athlete, a student and a girl. I was supposed to be the athlete.

"And was I hammy! Some campus comics brought me great wreaths of shrubbery and vegetables in honor of my performance. I finally saw the picture myself. And immediately gave up all thought of movie-acting.

"Also, when I was at Pasadena, movie scouts didn't have the habit they have now. They didn't cover the Playhouse, looking for talent. And I didn't cover the studios. I didn't have any illusions about my face for films."

After a year at Pasadena, he headed for New York with the idea: "All you need is one chance. Then, if you can deliver, you're set." It took Lloyd Nolan—who had always had such lucky breaks as an amateur and semi-professional actor—six years to find that one chance.

"I beat it for New York while I still had the fare," he recalled. "I didn't know anyone in the theatrical business there except one kid who was doing extras for the Theatre Guild.

"But Jed Harris was sending out a road company of 'Front Page,' which had opened on the day I hit New York. I happened to look a little like Joseph Spurin-Calleia, who was in the New York company. I landed his part on the road. I began my professional acting career in Chicago—not on Broadway. It took me time to get there.

"The next summer I went up to Cape Cod, to the Cape Playhouse at Dennis. I started there as a stagehand. At the end of the season, the company put on the 'Cape Cod Follies.' There was a pirate skit in it. Someone had to play the pirate so I was given the assignment. The Shuberts bought the show and took some of us to Broadway with it. I got my Broadway start as a song-and-dance man. Shades of George M. Cohan!"

After that—well, a stage-director friend suggested a small part in a play called "Sweet Stranger." The director thought it might lead to bigger things. What Lloyd didn't know was that another boy had been thrown out of the cast to make room for him.

Also, just before appearing for his first rehearsal with the company, he made the tactical error of indulging in an onion or two.

HE found himself facing scenes with a sweet stranger who seemed to regard him in the same class with prussic acid. She hated him. First, because she thought he had chiseled the other boy out of a job. And, secondly, because of the onions.

That girl was Mel Efird. Today she is Mrs. Lloyd Nolan. In those two sentences is a short short story of the Nolan charm. They were married during the run of the play. He told me:

"Nobody ever knew at the time. We didn't want anyone to know; we were that romantic. We spent three days trying to find a place that didn't require a certain period of residence or some other red tape. Finally, we had a bright idea: Why not get married right in New York? So down we went to City Hall and were married. And had no publicity whatsoever. By the time the press-agent of the show found out, it wasn't news any longer."

After "Sweet Stranger," he had a part in "Reunion in Vienna," with the Lunts. He played in summer stock, both at Dennis and at Scarborough-on-the-Hudson, and had small Broadway parts. The years began marching past. Three, four, five of them.

Finally, he was in another musical—the third edition of "Americana." It was a depression satire, "which was a little too bitter to be funny," he said. Lloyd played a gangster—Nails Mallarkey, Public Enemy Numbers One to Ten Inclusive. That was his first "heavy" role on Broadway. And he was a comedy "heavy." He had no presentiment whatsoever of what was ahead of him, in Hollywood.

Then came the biggest break he had had—the "one chance" he had been praying for. The leading role—the part of Biff Grimes—in "One Sunday Afternoon." (Gary Cooper later played it on the screen.)

"The night the show opened, the cast was broke and the director was broke. The same night, some radical took a shot at Roosevelt. That was all over the papers the next morning; nobody read the reviews. Then the banks closed. No play ever lived through what that play did. It was the only show that ran all through that summer. It lasted almost a year."

The movie scouts were around to see him, as soon as he clicked. He had tests and he had offers. But he didn't want to leave Broadway, just when he was finally getting somewhere.

"I did two more plays," Lloyd said. "One, 'Ragged Army,' was so terrific that it lasted two nights. From that, I hopped immediately into 'Gentlewoman,' which ran two weeks. I said, 'T'hell with Broadway!' and signed a movie contract."

He sat around for almost six months, a forgotten man who was drawing a salary, before he was assigned to a picture—"Stolen Harmony." The role was good; the picture, poor. When the company wanted to take up his option, he was "skitterish." He decided to free-lance; he thought he might keep busier that way.

He was in "G-Men"—on the side of law and order. He was in three other pictures whose titles he can't remember; he has an atrocious memory for names. Then he signed with Columbia, which promised to keep him busy—and did.

In fifteen months, he has played fourteen roles. Only seven of them, believe it or not, have been "heavies." But they are the ones that have made him stand out.

"I'm just getting used to the camera, just beginning to find myself," he said. "I've just found out, for example, why I was so ponderous when I thought I was only being deliberate. On film, everything you do is one-sixteenth slower than in real life. That sounds small. But you have to make allowance for it."

SO far as he is concerned, the secret of acting is mental relaxation. "The movies scare you at first. They make you too conscious of angles. I'll never forget one scene I did with Ruth Chatterton. I had to look at her soulfully, from an uncomfortable angle. Every time the camera went into action, I would get a cramp in my neck. That's funny now, but it was a nightmare then."

He likes the movies. "You don't have a chance to get into a role, as you do on the stage. You don't have the rehearsals. But, on the other hand, your performance has the merit of freshness and spontaneity. You don't become a phonograph, saying your lines, as you do during a long stage run."

He likes the movies for another reason. "You know where you sit. The stage is a pretty ungrateful business. It offers you a thrill, yes—but precious little security. Here in Hollywood, youth is in the money. . . . The stage is dying. I imagine it will eventually become something subsidized

IS A MOTHER'S LOVE ENOUGH?

BEDTIME . . . and mother caresses the tiny injured hand that she bandaged only this afternoon . . .

"There, darling, mother will kiss it and make it well."

But will she? Can she?

True, it was only a little cut . . . but even little cuts can be dangerous if the wound is not properly, carefully dressed. Infection can set in, and often does, if the bandage is not as clean as your own doctor would use.

Unfortunately, even some bandages that are plainly marked "sterilized" on the package are not worthy of your trust.

These bandages, of unknown make, probably were sterilized in an early manufacturing process, but in subsequent cutting, handling, and packing, dirty fingers may have touched them . . . destroyed their cleanliness.

So don't take chances. Be safe. Use only the first-aid products of known and reputable concerns. Johnson & Johnson is one of them.

Unloved

I once looked like this. Ugly hair on face...unloved...discouraged. Nothing helped. Depilatories, waxes, liquids...even razors failed. Then I discovered a simple, painless, inexpensive method. It worked! Thousands have won beauty and love with the secret. My FREE Book, "How to Overcome Superfluous Hair," explains the method and proves actual success. Mailed in plain envelope. Also trial offer. No obligation. Write Mlle. Annette Lanzette, P.O. Box 4040, Merchandise Mart, Dept. 338, Chicago.

like opera, by people who like the old personal touch. More and more, it will become just a training school for the movies—and television."

Unlike most of the movie "names," he lives right in Hollywood. The house belongs to somebody else, but the furniture belongs to Mel and himself. "So that when we do build, we won't have to pay out anything to furnish the new place, anyway."

They have no children. Their closest friends are Billy and Boots Mallory Cagney, the Fred MacMurrays and some Stanford people. They don't go out much. Mel rides horseback every day; Lloyd golfs every day; evenings, both of them like to read. "I'm on the wagon, so I don't get any fun out of going to cocktail parties or night-clubs. The only time we go is when Mel wants to show off some new dress. Which isn't often."

His favorite game used to be handball. "I played it until I was blue in the face. And kept putting on weight. So I took up golf. I've lost twenty pounds in eight months." He plays at Lakeside, where Bing Crosby is club champion.

His favorite clothes are sport clothes—which he seldom gets a chance to wear on the screen. He doesn't suggest an actor, either in appearance, accent or mannerisms. He is minus affectations.

Yet he is likely to be an actor for a long, long time.

That seven-year contract, with no options for three years, sounds like career insurance, even to Lloyd. "If a studio builds up a player, it wants to reap the benefit of its build-up. I think they'll keep me in good pictures, in good parts. They won't be capitalizing on their investment if they don't."

That's Lloyd Nolan, who has, as a "heavy," what it takes to become a star. You'll be seeing him.

Schuster-Martin School of the Drama there. He attended the Sisters of Mercy Academy, St. Xavier Academy and later was sent to the preparatory school of the University of Dayton, in Dayton, Ohio, for two years, after which he returned home and graduated from Purcell High School in 1931, at the age of seventeen.

Then followed the usual family conference about college which Tyrone ended by insisting firmly that he wanted to begin his career as an actor.

His father had been engaged for a short season in Shakespearean repertoire in the Chicago Civic Auditorium for the early fall of 1931, and he decided to give his son the opportunity he wanted so much. With that in mind he took Tyrone with him to his summer camp in Quebec. There, during the summer, under the direction of his father, the boy was given intensive study and rehearsals in the small roles he was to assume in Chicago in the fall.

It is likely that until the day he dies, Tyrone Power, Jr., will recall as the most pleasant period of his life, the summer in Canada with his father.

"It is a heavenly place," Tyrone told me, as we sat in a corner of the set where he was making "Love Is News" with Loretta Young and Don Ameche. "Father's camp was near the little village of Ile-Aux-Noix, on the Richelieu River. I have a little plot of ground there and when I get money enough I'm going to build a summer home on it.

"Every day we would get into a canoe and as we floated down the river, father would read Shakespeare to me and rehearse me and correct me as I read to him. Probably it was all for the best that the country was not very thickly populated, for people might have thought us a little queer, out on the river every day reading Shakespeare to the fish.

"The inhabitants of the village were mostly simple French people and Indians," he continued. "Father had some small moving pictures, which he would run off in our cabin at night and all the village folk would come to see them. The crowd and the smoke would be so thick we could scarcely see the screen but they loved it. Father stood at the side and kept up a running narrative, explaining everything in the pictures. It was marvelous," he added with a faraway look in his eyes.

I WAS never self-conscious with father," he told me, "because he had never been a father to me. That is, we had never lived together, and he seemed to me more like a wonderful friend and pal. I worshipped him and worked very hard because I wanted to show him that I was serious and ambitious. I wanted to justify his spending so much time with me."

At the end of the summer, Tyrone and his father returned to Chicago for the Shakespearean season. Tyrone's first role was as an old man, friend of the Doge of Venice, played by his father in "The Merchant of Venice."

At the conclusion of the season, Mr. Power was engaged to go to Hollywood to star in Paramount's talking version of "The Miracle Man." Tyrone was promised a small role in the picture and accompanied his father West. The picture was barely under way when Mr. Power was taken suddenly ill on the set. He continued working but at midnight he collapsed and a few hours later died in his son's arms.

The production went on with another star but Tyrone's "small role" never materialized. His mother and sister came on from the East to be with him and then followed a miserable two-and-a-half-year period, during which Tyrone tried desperately to gain a foothold in Hollywood. He knew plenty of people—producers, directors, influential people. He went the rounds of the studios in an effort to get work. He offered to play bits, to do extra work.

"Of course I was willing to do small parts," he laughed when he told me about it.

But his friends invited him to their homes for dinners and parties and were sorry they had nothing in pictures for him.

"I would be called for interviews and rush out full of enthusiasm only to discover that instead of a job, some friend of my father's wanted to talk about him and tell me about the time they appeared in a show together. They meant to be kind," Tyrone admitted, "but what I wanted was to work."

FINALLY, in desperation, he told his mother he was going to New York to try to get on the stage. Wisely, she made no attempt to dissuade him. On the contrary, she told him to watch his diction and to remember to send his shirts to the laundry.

He stopped off in Chicago to visit friends. The Century of Progress Exposition was in full swing and Tyrone got a job with the Circuit Theatre productions. That led to radio engagements.

His stay in Chicago wasn't all "beer and skittles" and there were, at times, long periods when he had no work, but he gained experience, and toward the close of 1934, he was engaged to play the part of Freddie in "Romance," which starred Eugenie Leontovitch at the Blackstone Theatre. The piece ran eight weeks and, feeling very affluent with eight weeks' savings in his pocket, Tyrone thought it was time for him to continue on his way to Broadway.

In New York, Michael Strange, the former wife of John Barrymore and an old family friend, provided a comfortable room for him, rent free. He budgeted his savings and allowed himself five dollars a week for his other expenses and started the rounds of producers' and agents' offices in search of a job.

He had loads of friends and life was very agreeable, socially speaking, except that always he found himself popular with people who had money when he had none. This led to frequent amusing situations like the time he walked down Broadway at midnight attired in tails, white tie and top hat, carrying his shoes in his hand.

"Well, my feet hurt," he explained, "and as I didn't have a nickel to pay my fare on the subway, I took off my shoes and walked."

Another time he was asked to join some friends at a house party in Charleston. He didn't have the railroad fare, but when one of the party bemoaned the fact that one of them would have to drive the car down, Tyrone offered.

"They asked me if I had enough money for gasoline and I assured them I had, but I didn't know how that car could use gas and I didn't know that Charleston was so far away," he told me.

"A hundred miles from Charleston I bought gas for the last time and had about a dollar left. The rest of the way I drove at 25 miles an hour in order to use as little gas as possible, and arrived in Charleston with the tank almost dry and my friends not due until the next day. I had never met the people we were going to visit, so I was faced with the problem of getting something to eat and finding a place to sleep.

"I dined on a hamburger and coffee and then found a nice quiet coal yard, where I parked the car, curled up in the back seat and spent the night.

"Next morning I was awakened by hearing someone talking. I sat up and there stood an old tramp, talking to himself. When he saw me he said it was a fine morning. I agreed with him and asked him to have a cup of coffee with me. He accepted and so my last dime went for two cups of coffee. Then I went to the station to meet my friends, and learned that on account of a wreck their train would be five hours late.

"What a blow that was!" he exclaimed. "My clothes were wrinkled, I needed a shave and I was hungry! I found a copy of 'Mutiny on the Bounty' in the car and I read that from cover to cover and finally the train arrived and with it my friends. They were astonished at my appearance and soon got me cleaned up and fed," he laughed.

"That is just one example of the experiences I had. At times it occurred to me that I had made a mistake; that I should have gone on to college."

HIS first "break" was provided by Helen Menken, whom he had met in Chicago during his Shakespearean season. She recommended him to Katharine Cornell's husband, Guthrie McClintic, and when Tyrone—on a hunch—asked for a pass to see Katharine's show, "Flowers of the Forest," he was given the pass and also two parts to take home and read. The next day he was assigned to understudy Burgess Meredith, the leading man, and another player, and spent the rest of the season waiting for an opportunity to go on. That chance never came but he learned enough by association with the company to make it a very profitable period, and in his pocket was a contract to appear in Miss Cornell's production of "Romeo and Juliet" the following fall.

"It wouldn't be hard to live in a cottage," she says. "Money is nice, but I know how to get along without a lot.

"When I was in the chorus, I learned to keep clothes lovely at very little expense. Lux was my stand-by. I found I could afford beautifully sheer stockings if I Luxed them every night. That way I hardly ever got runs. Naturally I insist all my washables be cared for in the very same way now!"

Clever Alice! Cake-soap rubbing and harsh soaps that may contain harmful alkali often fade colors—wear nice things out too soon. Lux has no harmful alkali. Safe in water, safe in Lux!

When the show closed he went to West Falmouth, Massachusetts, to play with a summer stock company, and when reports of his popularity there began to get around, Hollywood scouts were on his trail.

But now Tyrone had the upper hand. He didn't have to accept Hollywood's offer; he had a contract. He was learning more about acting every day and he decided he would not return to Hollywood until he could write his own terms.

He appeared with Miss Cornell in "Romeo and Juliet" and was re-engaged by her to play opposite her in "St. Joan." It was while he was appearing in this play that he was persuaded to go to Hollywood and sign a long-term contract.

Although he likes New York better than Hollywood, he thinks he can stand it here at the salary he is getting. "What is there to do here that is fun?" he asked good-naturedly, and given his first vacation, he rushed off to New York where Sonja Henie was, too. In fact it looks like love. But—

The much-publicized romance between Tyrone and Sonja Henie is largely in the imagination of the gossip columnists and actually is just a gay friendship. That's what Tyrone says! But if it isn't love the young man is giving a darn good imitation of it.

Anyone who has seen Sonja must have noticed a gorgeous diamond and sapphire clip, fashioned like a pair of skates, which she always wears. Tyrone was amazed one morning to read in the paper that it was a present from him.

"Holy smoke!" he exclaimed. "That clip cost more money than I can make in six months."

When I lunched with him our conversation was interrupted with depressing regularity by incoming telephone calls. Each time he returned to the table with an amused expression on his face, and took, good-naturedly, the jibes of Loretta Young, who sat at the next table. However, in spite of the fact that women run after him, he is very popular with men. He will never be called a "pretty boy" by the columnists.

In spite of the fact that his mother is justifiably proud of his accomplishments, he is no pampered boy at home by any means.

"My mother never tells me how good I am," he laughed. "When I get home from work at night she asks me if I remembered what she had told me about my diction. You can be sure I'll never get a swelled head.

And he is glad she does, and grateful. Because of his background and knowledge of the business, his personal observations and the hard knocks he himself has endured, he is appreciative of his chance on the screen. He realizes that now is his big opportunity and he is going to let nothing stop him. He wants more than anything in this world to be a good actor.

"I'd like to be as good an actor as Sonja Henie is a skater," he said earnestly, which was just his way of saying that he'd like to be the best actor in the world.

This Caballero Can Cook!

Carrillo, yas suh," until the end of his days.

"I SUPPOSE we should start our cooking lesson with Chili Con Carne," Carrillo began with a gay, mischievous smile, "only it really should be called Carne Con Chili, you know, or Meat with Chili. But whether or not you anglicize the name does not matter so long as the dish itself is prepared in true Mexican fashion. In making it, I grind the Chili peppers in a metate or stone mixing bowl with a stone crusher—just as the Mexicans have done for countless years. A satisfactory result can be obtained, of course, with Chili Powder," he hastened to add.

Just to be on the safe side, I'm going to give you both methods in the recipe leaflet, so that Californians, Texans and residents of other states bordering on Mexico can make their own essence of Chili while others can achieve the desired bitey flavor with the more generally used Powder. Gebhardt's is the brand suggested by Mr. Carrillo. For family consumption or party refreshment nothing will prove more welcome than this well-known, well-liked dish of the American Southwest.

"With the Chili," continued Carrillo, "we serve Frijoles (Spanish beans), and Tortillas, of course, since they take the place of bread. Usually for parties there is also a gigantic pottery bowl of Mexican Rice. I believe that this rice dish somewhat resembles what is more generally known as Spanish Rice. I say 'somewhat,' however, for in my opinion, the resemblance between other ways of preparing rice and this one is slight indeed.

To top off this dinner you should have fruit—fresh fruit or fruit-filled Empanadas, according to my host. Generally, an Empanada is a small meat-filled pie of the turnover variety, I was informed. But when Willie's extra-flaky pastry is filled with a special fruit mixture instead of with meat, it is changed into a dessert dish. The filling suggested by Mr. Carrillo has some of the characteristics of Mince Meat, only it's easier to make, by far. You'll be amused to know that this Californian is true to his native state even in the ingredients he includes in his recipes. Among the things called for in these Empanadas are lemons, raisins, walnuts and oranges—though these last are in the form of candied peels, which, as you know, can be purchased in small boxes at your grocer's.

The same fruits that I have just mentioned, with the addition of prunes, are made into a delicious conserve for which Mrs. Carrillo also provided a recipe. It's called California Conserve aptly enough, since it features so many of that state's products. But its real appeal, I suspect, will be for non-Californians because this conserve can be made in the dead of winter when other fruits are out of season in all other sections of the country.

THIS conserve recipe alone would make it worth your while to mail in the coupon, but in addition I can promise you recipes for the more strictly Mexican dishes that the Carrillos feature on their menus, the Empanadas, the Chili Con Carne and that highly recommended rice concoction. They're all in the leaflet—and they're all free.

There are many other recipes which were given me by Mr. Carrillo in rather sketchy form. These recipes, unlike the others described above, were not quite clear as to amounts of ingredients to be used. So, although those already familiar with Mexican cooking may be able to follow them, others may remain somewhat puzzled. However, I thought I'd include Mr. Carrillo's directions at the end of this article anyway, for the good of the initiated and the general interest of the uninitiated. Besides many of these foods contribute to the success of the famous Carrillo Barbecues—invitations to which are eagerly sought by stars, directors and society folk alike—so I'm confident you'll want to know more about them.

"For our barbecues," Mr. Carrillo told me, "the menu is not fancy but the servings are gigantic. People seem to develop the most amazing appetites as they gather around the barbecue pits. Here we prepare huge hunks of barbecued steak, liberally doused with Salsa Sauce, which is made of green peppers, tomatoes, onions and vinegar, all highly seasoned. Here, also, we roast corn and toast French bread, which is first buttered and then rubbed with garlic. Sometimes roasted potatoes are included on the menu and always coffee is served in copious quantities. While the food is cooking, we sing Mexican songs and dance to the strumming of a guitar. This is lovely, especially when the sun goes down and the moon rises over the nearby hills, for then it is a place of enchantment. After the meal we adjourn to the living room of the ranch house or gather around the fireplace in one of the patios where we tell stories and sing more songs.

UNDER the low-tiled roofs of the rambling house are deep, recessed windows like those of the old adobe houses of Mexico. There are numerous patios flagged with stone and huge rooms with white plastered walls, heavy doors and raftered ceilings. The furniture is of heavy Monterey style with many deep couches and chairs, covered with bright colored fabrics. Floors and walls are bright with Mexican rugs while colorful pottery is displayed on every side.

In two wall recesses are little figures of the Virgin of Guadalupe—patron saint of Mexico. Everything, in fact, is Mexican rather than Spanish, supplemented by a wonderful collection of early Californian trappings such as ropes, saddles, stirrups and branding irons. Carrillo's study is full of these things while on the walls are pictures of his friends—cartoons which he himself has made of them. There is also a bar decorated with Mexican motifs with bright Mexican pottery and glassware. Carrillo likes nothing better than to explain his interesting collection, unless it's giving parties, which he does on every possible occasion—always of an informal nature, at which the host entertains with songs, for which he plays his own accompaniment on the guitar or cello and then relinquishes the role of entertainer for that of caterer with equal skill and enthusiasm.

Small wonder that the beauty of his home, the delightful quality of his hospitality and the fame of his cooking cannot be topped in the whole movie colony. Even less to be wondered at is the reluctance with which I dragged myself away from these lovely surroundings once I had the detailed, carefully written recipes for the leaflet and the other, rather sketchy ones, which I'm giving you here, in Carrillo's own words.

costume are pictured. Anita Louise wears the very new looking bolero jacket suit. You'll meet up with boleros at every turn this spring for they not only appear in the suit field but for all sorts of daytime and evening combinations, too. Anita Louise's skirt and bolero are made of a bright navy blue wool, the jacket cleverly trimmed with the red, blue and yellow print of the challis blouse.

A mixed woolen fabric is used for Sylvia Sidney's tailored suit. Helen Taylor designed this for her to wear in "You Only Live Once." The striped piping for the lapel and collar is a different detail and the matching scarf makes an effective vestee. Her small felt turban, trimmed with grosgrain ribbon is an excellent hat style for right now when you need a new hat to bridge the gap between winter models and the first straws.

For costume number three, there's the important silk dress. This is one item that can't be interchanged with something else. It has to be included with any list of four you may wish to select. The less fussy detail it has and the simpler the cut, the more ways you can change its personality with accessories, belts, jewelry, etc.

Elissa Landi's beautifully cut black silk is just what the budget wardrobe cries out for. The fabric and the cut make the dress. The fabric is self-patterned with a sheen that gives it the look of taffeta. And the slim skirt will be smart long after the exaggerated "swing" skirts are forgotten. The elbow-length sleeves, so new this winter, will make Elissa's dress look spring-like later on. Gold or colored beads, pearls, clips, flowers and belts are all tricks to keep this charming dress going smartly from one season to another.

As I said earlier, I have put an evening gown on my list to make the fourth costume. But this is entirely optional depending upon your individual needs. The perfect budget evening gown is a simply made crepe one with moderate cut to the neckline and no exaggerated silhouette details. Julie Haydon's black crepe gown with gold beaded net bolero is an excellent example of what I mean. A gown similar to this can be had for as low as ten dollars. And the bolero is one way to change its party character. Like Elissa's afternoon dress, this simple gown can be varied by its accessories so that none can say, "Mary's wearing that old black crepe again!"

CHOOSING four such reliable basic costumes is only part of the budget story. Once you have them in your closet, you've got to use the extra pennies on accessories. If your funds are dwindling fast, figure out just how to get by with the least possible bag, hat and shoe changes. A good beret can double for everything from sports to afternoon clothes if you pick a plain dark one that can be tricked up with pins, clips or a feather. If you can't afford more than one handbag, choose a good shape in calfskin rather than the more perishable suede or antelope. And, believe it or not, one pair of suede pumps and one pair of calf oxfords will take you through a fall and winter, provided you help them along with brushing, polishing and new lifts for heels the minute they wear down.

Speaking of shoes, be sure to look closely at the two pairs shown on page 58. They are the first smart steps toward spring and a perfect investment right now. If you would like to know the prices of these and where to buy them, just send in for my March Shopping Bulletin, the coupon's at the end of this article waiting for your name, address, etc. New spring shoes go in for most attractive fabric and color combinations. Instep cuts remain high and there are loads of cut-out details to give the airy open look that will be so popular. Take that step-in pump, pictured. It's made with a very dainty, feminine silhouette. The body of the shoe is navy blue gabardine—a fabric that will rate tops in all sorts of shoe models this spring—and the trim is navy patent leather, intricately patterned.

The tie is a perfect suit shoe and it shows both the contrast of leathers and color. Beige suede for the top of the shoe with the toe and heel in reddish tan calfskin. This particular tan is a variation of the London tan of last spring—it's deeper and more adaptable to spring costume colors. The interesting laced trim of this tie is typical of the careful attention to detail which you'll find in all your spring shoes.

This gay bonnet of Virginia Bruce's is like the first robin; it brings you news of spring! It's a tricky combination of brown linen trimmed with bandings of brown and white bamboo. The broad brim, shallow crown effect is smart.

Straps will be very good again this coming season, some have a short T strap design that is new and flattering to the foot. Look for loads of patent leather, both forming whole shoes and used as trimming. The patent leather pump with perforations is being pushed as a classic suit shoe.

The spring shoe colors run something like this: for street—black, navy, brown, Chaudron (tan) and gray, also much beige used in contrast with other colors and especially black. You'll find beige is going to be very big both in accessories and costumes.

While talking about shoes and their colors, would you like to know what stocking shades to pick for your early spring shoes? There's a new stocking shade that has a definite gold cast to it and it is suggested for wear with more formal costumes now and with pastels and white this summer. Two coppery tones will be popular, one has a rosy cast and the other is a really radiant copper shade. The rosy colored copper is suggested for wear with spring blues, coral and reddish rust tones in clothes and with blue and russet colored shoes. The brighter copper tone is for costumes in the new rust and copper tones, greens, navy, beige, brown and black.

The rage for beige in clothes and accessories brings out a showing of beige in the stocking lines, too. These hosiery beiges run the gamut from a warm but light tone, through the grayish shades to the darker beige colors.

GLOVES take up the beige note, too, and three distinct shades of it will be popular for your new gloves. There's a pale coffee color which will be particularly effective with brown, black and the bright shades in costumes. Then there's a very feminine looking pinky beige for more formal afternoon and evening costumes. Also a neutral beige for general daytime wear. The glove designers stress the point that beige gloves are not to be worn with beige costumes, rather they are to contrast with the bright and dark shades of your clothes—they can match your hosiery, if you like.

Buttons, tucking, stitching, perforations and embroidery play a big part in glove design, reflecting the details of costumes and being allied with the trimmings of shoes and bags.

Boleros and short jackets, either in plain colors or with gay braid and embroidery trimmings are an inexpensive and slick way to perk up both silk and wool dresses you are beginning to tire of. If you are good with your needle, you can have a supply of these jackets to vary all your daytime and sports costumes. Remnants of material can be picked up at this time of the year which will make just such jackets at a minimum of expense. That black crepe evening gown of Julie's, for instance, could well have four or five different jackets, introducing bright color accents.

Anne Shirley has different strings of flower necklaces, or leis as they are called in Hawaii. These are all made of artificial flowers and cost but little to make. What they do for a plain evening gown is worth dollars to the budget. The whole secret of stretching your four basic costumes into a large wardrobe, is to be on the lookout for fashion ideas and tricks that can be copied for a song.

For daytime clothes, the gay peasant accessories give a definite lift to the picture. Scarfs, painted wooden jewelry and buttons, all the colorful gadgets of Tyrolian and Dalmatian inspiration lend themselves to such practical pepping up of your clothes. The Dalmatian peasant theme has an edge on the Tyrolian at the moment. It can be spotted in military looking jackets and sleeveless boleros worn over brightly colored frocks—these are braid trimmed and embroidered. Flat, pillbox hats of bright felts are part of this, too. If you add only touches of these trends to your four classic costumes, you never run the risk of investing too heavily in a fad that will wane and leave you with unwearable clothes on your hands.

Before signing off, I want to mention that next month I am devoting my article to news about fabrics and silhouettes for spring. You know how important it is to have some sure-fire guide to lines of dresses, suits and coats, as well as what sort of fabrics will be the best investment for you. Lots about silk prints, suit and coat woolens, rayons, et al.

Love Comes to Mary Pickford

have known. The young laughter of Marilyn and my brother Jack, when they were married here. The baby laughter of my cousin Verna Chalif's boy, when he was christened here. The gentle laughter of my mother, when she was pleased. The gay laughter of Gwynne and her young friends as they played, talked and studied. The parties we've had. The plans we made. Jack Gilbert's electric laughter and the kind, wise voice of Will Rogers . . .

"But now it is finished," Mary said, "and a new life begins for me. I want it to be new, in every way.

"I believe that we will build something very sweet and very sound, Buddy and I. Our tastes are fundamentally simple. We are not 'party' people. We both love books and gardens, music and games, a few friends about us and family life. Neither of us cares for formality or ostentation. Both of us have worked hard and saved our money 'against a rainy day.' Both of us are family people, loving our own, devoted to them. One of the things that first drew me to Bud was his family life. For Buddy and his mother and father, brother and sister, remind me of the way Mama and Lottie and Jack and I used to be when we were all together—so close, so all for one and one for all. I feel a member of the Rogers' family now, and that's so warm, so nice.

"Yes, we have the real things in common, I think. He is so sweet with me, so protective, so gentle."

"Isn't he," I said, "just a little bit in awe—oh, not of you, really, of course—but of marrying Mary Pickford who is, after all, a world figure?"

Mary laughed aloud at that one. "If he is," she said, "he certainly manages to conceal it beautifully. He—why, he bosses me!"

And Mary in a white crepe de chine slack suit with navy blue tie and belt, her famous fair hair clustered thickly about her earnest, happy face, did not look very awesome. She did look quite childishly bossable.

"No," Mary said, in answer to my next question, "no, I really didn't know that we would be married until a very few days before Judge Rogers broke the news in the papers back in their home town of Olathe, Kansas. He was so cute about it, the Judge. They tell me he looked like a small boy who expects to be spanked. He just couldn't keep it in, that's all. And it really didn't matter. What difference did it make? It was so.

"I was uncertain about our marriage only because I felt that if Bud had to travel with his band we couldn't have any kind of a home life. And I do not believe in long separations, in long-distance marriages. I certainly would not want Bud to give up his band, either. He has worked so hard with it, built it up and he loves it. He should not have to give it up—no man should give up his work. But now I think that he may go on the air with it, broadcasting from Hollywood. And if that works out, our home life can be, for the most part, uninterrupted!"

And I couldn't help thinking, as Mary spoke of Buddy's band, of her desire for him to continue with it even though to do so might have meant the sacrifice or postponement of their marriage. I couldn't help thinking how little people change in their essentials and of how like Mary this is. I couldn't help thinking, too, how false and silly were the rumors which said that Mary's refusal to travel with Douglas Fairbanks was the major reason for their separation and subsequent divorce.

For Mary did travel with Douglas, practically the world over. I know, I remember through the years a long series of saying hello and goodbye to Mary as, from ports East and West, she set sail with Douglas. She travelled with him when, between you and me, to do so meant the sacrifice of her health. She sailed for the Orient when she was ill and came back weighing ninety pounds. She travelled with Douglas by plane when to do so was definitely risky, not to say dangerous. She travelled with him when she should have remained in Hollywood making pictures. Douglas was wont to make one stupendous big production a year. One was all he needed to make, all he could afford to make on the magnificent scale of his operations. But Mary, making smaller, less spectacular pictures should have made two or three a year. She didn't. She deliberately sacrificed her career in order to "pick up and go" with Douglas.

All of which is past history and "off the record," really. An intensely dramatic part of Pickford history, and the truth about it, which has never been told before. Never really realized before, I think. And it is analogous to this story only because it reminds me, so forcibly again, of how Mary has been, always, the woman before the actress, the wife before the celebrity.

"I want to live in Buddy's house," Mary was saying. She laughed and added, "If a man wants to build a home for his bride, the least the bride can do is live in it—and want to!

"Bud owns some property in the San Fernando Valley. And this is our plan (it was to be kept secret, but I'll tell it to you). We hope to build a house in the valley, a new house, with everything in it new. It will be a ranch type of house, comfortable, not too rustic. A low, rambling and friendly house. It will not be formal and it will not be pretentious, but it will be comfortable. Everything in it will be the best—the important things, I mean, especially. We will have the nicest rugs and carpets. We will have the finest linens and silver, the gayest and most decorative china. Not priceless things nor museum pieces but comfy, livable things. We'll have big, deep chairs. We'll have all kinds of games and bright lamps to light them properly. And we'll have big, practical fireplaces upstairs and down.

"I shall take very little with me from Pickfair. A very few of the things I myself found and bought when I was abroad. And the gifts from my friends all over the world. I'll take an original Adam settee in the lower hall, my mother's portrait, one or two fine old mirrors and chests and things I have grown to love too well to leave. And a few of the books. That is all."

And without a sigh, without a shadow of regret on her face Mary's eyes rested on the priceless, beautiful table from the Barberini Palace in Rome, on boxes and chairs and divans from the palaces of kings.

The Dick Powells (Joan Blondell) step out to a premiere of "Lloyds of London." Dick looks contented, doesn't he?

"Gwynne will be with us, of course," Mary said. "She is very fond of Bud and he of her. And she is so happy for me. Mrs. Lewis, my secretary and dear friend, will be with us, too. And I shall take most of the servants of Pickfair, who are members of the family now.

"We plan to raise polo ponies on the ranch. Bud loves polo, you know. He is playing this afternoon. And I shall be interested in the ponies, too, as I am interested in all young, growing things.

"And then, I'll have my garden. When I walk about the gardens of Pickfair now and watch the growing things and realize that next year I shall not be here to see the acacia trees turn golden, see how the roses are 'doing,' I might well be a little sad—and then I remember that gardens are perennial, that I shall be planting new gardens and watching things grow. And I realize that all that matters is that there is a garden.

"There is, happily," smiled Mary, "another Eden for me. Not the same. Different, of course, as no two friendships are identical so no two loves are identical. But because they are different does not imply that they are less beautiful, less precious, one than another.

"It will be fun, making a new home. I think we shall have several homes, as a matter of fact. Well, three or four, anyway. We'll have the ranch. Then we'd like to have a place at Arrowhead, a big, comfortable place all stocked with tinned goods and things. A place to which we could go and to which, also, we could give the key to our friends and say to them, 'Go on up and have a rest. You'd better take a bottle of milk and a steak with you but you'll find everything else there.' And then, perhaps, a beach house," Mary continued, "and homes, all of them.

"I'll love shopping, planning and consulting together. I love homemaking and so does he. I always have had a passion for linen closets, lavender-scented, for arranging flowers and planning menus. I'll have a new home," Mary said, with her bright, brand-new happiness lighting her eager face, "where all kinds of lovely things will grow and not," she said quietly, "not only flowers. . . . "

I said, "But you'll entertain as you always have, won't you?"

"Of course, we will," said Mary (she always says "we," never "I"). "My friends will come to us as they always have come. I've had such lovely wires, cables and letters from everyone since our engagement was announced. I was a little afraid, you know, before we announced it. I always am afraid when I take any new step, however much I may want to take it. But everyone has been happy for me.

"Yes, we'll entertain in the same way as I did at Pickfair. For Pickfair, as I think you know, and contrary to opinion, has never been a formal place. I've always left my guests free to do as they pleased, when and how they pleased. And there are no people more informal and loving informality more than titled persons, famous persons of all kinds who have to be formal most of the time. I remember," laughed Mary, "one time when a young Duchess was a guest here. We were comparing heights. I told her that I am five feet. She took the idea of the five feet literally and believed that it meant five times the length of her own foot. She straightway stretched out on the floor of my bedroom and put one foot on top of the other five times and then exclaimed, 'Why, that is only half as tall as you are!' I had to explain that a foot in our language is twelve inches! It was really very funny to see her stretched out there on the floor, dinner gown and all. And I have been at many a formal function where distinguished guests have whispered, 'Let's get out of here, we're bored stiff. Let's go and have some fun!'

"We will have fun," Mary stated, earnestly, "in the home which Bud and I will build.

"I have no definite plans about my future work. Neither what, nor when, nor how. Bud will have his band and he will make pictures. I will produce again. I may make a picture even. I may go on the air and I may write. I certainly shall do something. I believe that everyone should have his work, his own interests, not be dependent entirely upon the interests or work of anyone else. That kind of marriage runs the danger of becoming too possessive, too parasitic.

"I plan to close Pickfair—or sell it. I couldn't lease it. It has been suggested that Pickfair should be made into a museum because so much interest has been shown in it. Many thousands of tourists have entered these gates, which have never been closed. But I feel that the money it would take to endow it and maintain it as a museum should be put to more practical use. The world today needs homes even more than it needs monuments and museums. I should like to use the money for a home for picture people—but not Pickfair, it isn't suitable, it isn't adaptable to this use— a home for actors and actresses of the screen who are old or ill, tired and discouraged. A place to which they could go, paying a little or not at all. A home to which they could feel that they had the right, earned by all the amusement, all the laughter, all the surcease they had given the world in bygone years, in better times.

"I should like it to be a place where my people could be together, not strewn about, lonely, in boarding houses and hotel rooms. I'd like the home to have projection machines so that the 'family' could see current pictures, keep in touch with things. I should like to have a game room called the Jack Pickford Room. I should like it to have a living-room, sunny and warm and hospitable, called the Charlotte Pickford Room. And over the fireplace, in that room, I should like to hang my mother's picture. This, to me," said Mary, "would serve a far better purpose than perpetuating Pickfair as a musuem.

"I should like to sell Pickfair. But if I sell it, it must be to the right people, to people I can feel 'belong.' I should like a family to buy it, a happy family with young people so that laughter would remain within these walls. I would like sensitive, appreciative people to buy it so that they might find pleasure in the lovely things and in all the love and care which have gone into Pickfair. I would want the people who live here after I have gone to be happy."

Later, we stood together on the white portico, overlooking the hills. Mary said, "I didn't intend to talk about our marriage at all. And then I thought I'd like you to tell all of my friends how it is with me."

Gail Patrick need never worry about her next meal for she's just married Bob Cobb, manager of the Brown Derby!

My Daughter, Myrna Loy

IT is my theory that parents do not deserve the privilege of picking their children's futures. I wished that my son would be a doctor, but he wanted to be an artist. Myrna first believed she would be a great dancer. Her father said it was all right for her to go to dancing school; he recognized that aesthetic dancing embodies the finest ideals of art and music. He declared she might dance at benefits, at Elk banquets to which we went. But "No daughter of mine is going to be a chorus girl!" He fancied all professional dancers were just chorus girls, and of questionable morals.

When Myrna was ten we took a trip to California. We were shown through one of the major studios and watched them take an elaborate sequence in which a small girl broke out of a fancy egg and danced exquisitely. That inspired Myrna; she saw what she might do if she could excel in dancing.

We spent the next winter in California. Then back to Helena where Myrna continued dancing lessons at a convent. A year after Mr. Williams' death I had a severe attack of pneumonia and the two children and I came West again for the warm winter. We bought a house in Beverly Hills, the same one I still live in, and stayed on permanently. My sister joined us, and Auntie Lou has been like a second mother to Myrna.

I sent her to Westlake, an exclusive girls' school in Los Angeles, and then to Venice High School. She hated mathematics, but was crazy about dramatics and English.

Myrna never had many dates all the time she was in high school. She didn't want them—not enough, at least, to powder over her freckles and use make-up and turn flapperish. If you've assumed that all film actresses must be gaudy butterflies, you're wrong. Myrna wasn't, and isn't.

She had her silent crushes that she'd tell only me about. But she was too shy and indifferent to let boys guess that she was interested.

High school boys were too carefree to hold her interest. She admired men who had an aim in life, who were diligently preparing for splendid tomorrows. Indeed, with one exception Myrna has always been attracted to older men.

SHE graduated from high school when she was sixteen. She was very restless, yearning to do something but not sure where her destiny lay. Then one morning a girl friend came over and said she had had a call from Grauman's Egyptian Theatre, then the show spot of the state. Why didn't Myrna come along and try out for the new prologue, too? Here was something tangible, and Myrna rushed to me.

Well, I asked myself, why not? She would most likely not get a job, but why spoil her fun! However, I sincerely felt she had a true talent for dancing. I had taken her to see the great dancers when they gave recitals. She had gone into ecstasies over Pavlowa. I had accompanied her at the piano when she danced at benefits, and when there was an orchestra I had even gone into the pit and played especially for her.

When the telephone rang later that day I learned she had been hired and her friend hadn't! And so Myrna began careering. She danced twice a day in the prologues for a year and a half. Those girls she met at Grauman's weren't cheap. Sid Grauman was very particular about his troupe, and Myrna always came straight home after performances.

● "Good grief, Mr. Giraffe, what a perfectly terrific rash you've got! You're broken out all over, even on your tail. And your neck's a sight! When a person has so much neck, it must be awful!"

She isn't socially inclined, but she isn't shy with friends. We always had a houseful, it seems. The other striving youngsters Myrna met, artists and musicians and embryonic movie stars, came to our place. We didn't entertain formally; they'd roll up the rugs and dance to phonograph records. They'd play silly games, crowd into the kitchen to make candy. They all had burning artistic ambitions, and they shared their plans with her.

We haven't lost track of those old chums. Some have succeeded, some haven't. Many an old friend pops up unexpectedly, to Myrna's delight.

CERTAINLY, I can't forget the episode of the Valentinos, noticing portraits of Myrna at a Boulevard photographer's. She never hides her freckles, and she won't fuss with make-up for the street. But she's always been a dreamer, lured by her active imagination into visualizing herself the opposite of the straightforward self that she is. The lovely dancing costumes in one prologue captured her eye, and she had some photographs made in similar costume. The Valentinos had a sudden hunch that she could become the captivating exotic they needed for the picture Natacha Rambova Valentino was to make.

Myrna had done some extra work meanwhile. The girls at the theatre occasionally danced in pictures. She was fascinated at the idea of this new future. So she serenely quit her job, although Natacha and Rudy hadn't absolutely promised her the coveted lead.

One of Myrna's salient traits is her optimism. She's had discouragements, but I've never known her to be dismayed for more than a few brief moments. She is endowed with a quiet self-confidence. But more valuable is her dogged determination. She never relied on mere luck. I know she hasn't been lucky! She has worked for every advance she's had. She was never lazy, nor moody, as are many artists. Oh, she's grateful for the help she's had. Of course, no one gets anywhere without recognition and boosts from those who are convinced of one's possibilities.

She won the role in Natacha's production, but Rudy died and the film was never released. However, Warners signed her, much to her surprise and joy. She isn't superstitious, by the way. That first contract came on a Friday, the 13th!

Her father's family was furious with me. They wrote, demanding to know why I was permitting Myrna to go ahead like this. Her father had left us enough to live on; she didn't have to do bits in the movies, be "exposed" to the pitfalls of a career. I didn't pay any attention to them, for I sympathized with Myrna. I knew that no one could hurt her against her will. Today, all those who were so upset are so proud of her progress.

Many mothers question me as to what I advised my daughter about men. I was frank with Myrna. Not overly so during her adolescence, because I didn't want her to be calloused to the emotion of love when it eventually sprang into her life. I explained what was necessary and so I retained her full confidence. She knew that she could talk things over with me and that I'd be as sympathetic as a girl friend, and would have more wisdom.

I never put fear into her heart. If I were anxious, and I was once in awhile, I never let her realize it. I never warned her; I never had to. She was blessed with common sense. When she was waiting for buses or street cars to come home after the show, for instance, no one tried to give her a ride. Obviously, she didn't want to be picked up. It's trite, but a man treats a woman as she wants him to.

Myrna always felt she was in love with this one or that one—those silent crushes I mentioned. One time a friend of mine, in the oil business, said he had an acquaintance, a prominent business man, whom Myrna would find just the sort she wanted for a husband. I told him to save his breath. For Myrna was so wrapt up in her profession that she couldn't care for a man who wasn't in it, too. When she met Arthur Hornblow, and I began hearing about him, I knew that at last she had really fallen in love.

Her husband isn't an opposite type. He and Myrna like the same things. He's a student, just as she is. He, too, would rather read than fritter away time. He has a genuine respect for the arts; his father was a producer of the best dramas in the theatre and he is carrying on in the same way in the pictures he produces.

He is a home man, also, and that binds them together in a common bond. They are completing a beautiful Early American farmhouse in Hidden Valley, a forty-minute drive from the city, and they've schemed out every minute detail together. It isn't to be a Hollywood palace; it centers about a five-acre farm where they can establish a family life to their liking. The outstanding word I can think of to describe it is that it will be comfortable. Myrna's like a child about the swimming pool—they've built it exactly like an old swimming hole!

THEY entertain moderately. As a producer, Arthur naturally has certain obligations, but Myrna still doesn't care for night clubs and dress-up parties. Personally, I've always been very fond of dancing and mixing with people. I used to feel she was missing something by being so studious. But she'd reply, "How can I miss what means nothing to me?"

Myrna hasn't had to acquire style. Being so artistic, she's had a natural eye for proper lines. But she isn't the least bit extravagant about clothes. She buys many dresses ready-made in Los Angeles stores. She wears sports things mostly. When she went to Paris two years ago she didn't return with a lot of clothes; she isn't awed by labels and she didn't like what she saw as well as our American modes.

She didn't have a great deal of fight in her when she started. She still isn't forward, but she has developed spunk as she's climbed, realizing that she has to speak up for her rights in such a competitive business.

Today, she still drives her own roadster, and it's a medium-priced one. She's still canny with her salary, investing it carefully. She isn't a show-off at all and that's why she hasn't much jewelry. Her favorite piece is a funny little bracelet Arthur gave her. Strung on it is a pin-point diamond engagement ring, a tiny wheelbarrow as a memo of the gardening they're doing, and a couple of other little symbols of their happiness. She would rather vie with him as to which one of them can cook the best dish on the servants' night out than to dine in glamorous state at the Trocadero.

I treasure the compliment she paid me the other day. She said, as we were driving out to see the final touches on her new home, "You never put a stone in my path, Mother."

This Caballero Can Cook!

FRIJOLES

Take small pink Spanish beans. Wash well, drain and put into large saucepan. Cover with water, about two inches over the top, add a pinch of soda and soak overnight. Next day add as much water as has evaporated and boil three hours in the same water—or until beans can be crushed between thumb and forefinger. Fry a couple of finely chopped onions in vegetable shortening. Add the beans which have been well drained, crushing them slightly with the flat of a spoon. Add salt and ¼ pound ordinary store cheese, grated, also 1 tablespoon chili powder or essence of ground chili. Cook gently until cheese has melted and mixture is well blended.

SALSA SAUCE

Take peeled tomatoes, green peppers and onions, chop very fine and cook in a little water with some vinegar added to it. Season highly with salt and pepper.

BARBECUED MEAT

Get the biggest, tenderest steaks you can lay your hands on and cut about three to four inches thick. Cook on iron bars over barbecue pit, filled with glowing coals. While meat is cooking, you swab it with a sauce made of olive oil, parsley and garlic, using a little stick on which is attached a rag, if you'd be really Spanish. Serve with Salsa Sauce.

TORTILLAS

Take flour, water and butter, or lard. Knead very thoroughly, then make into little balls about half the size of your hand. Flatten these out on hot griddle to about the thickness of a blotter. When partially browned, flop them over and brown partially on other side. Corn meal or part corn meal may be substituted for the flour.

(Note: As Mr. Carrillo forgot to mention the proportions of flour, water, etc., I'm going to suggest that for your Tortillas you try a recipe that I have used which calls for 2 cups of flour, 1 teaspoon of salt, 2 tablespoons shortening and approximately ½ cup warm water. Mix in the order given, knead well, allow to stand at room temperature for ½ hour, knead again and proceed as directed in previous recipe.)

radically different from the Russian notion, where an old injury rankles within a man's mind for years. Also, American humor seemed to be founded on ridicule of the adversities of life. It was easy for me to launch into that vein, anxious as I was to forget the life that I had led in my childhood. Around home I clowned. In the theatre, though, which I joined when I was nineteen, I was always cast in tragic or villainous roles. After eight years in Hollywood, the films have at last discovered that I am a comic. But when I act funny for the camera, I am not acting. I am doing just what I do around the house or at parties. I'm getting paid for being myself, not for acting."

If Auer's professional problem seems complex, the break that brought him cinema attention is not. If Gregory LaCava had not remembered, as he was making "My Man Godfrey," that one of the members of his cast, namely, Mischa Auer, had a panicking "gorilla act," and that he had seen it eight years before at a Hollywood party, Mischa would probably still be not more than a glorified bit player.

There is one reservation to this. About the time of "Godfrey," Rouben Mamoulian cast Auer as a strong, silent Indian, with marked satiric overtones, in "The Gay Desperado." All Auer had to do was to walk around with a heavy expression, a colorful blanket, dank locks, a sugar-loaf hat perched atop his head (in 133-degree-Arizona-desert temperature) and, without saying a word, express disapproval at the waning savagery of Mexican banditry. Auer said for a month he did nothing but lift heavy lids and drop them, witheringly, until he was ready, in his own words, to "commit suicide from boredom."

Mischa didn't do away with himself, however. Instead, when the two films, "My Man Godfrey" and "The Gay Desperado," were released, one on the heels of the other, a new discovery loomed on the Hollywood horizon.

CHESTNUT-HAIRED, pale-faced and black-eyed Auer accepts the news that he is Hollywood's newest funny man with the same fatalism that he accepted his mother's death, of typhus in Constantinople; his flight from Russia with her when word reached them that she was on a Chekov (Bolshevik Secret Police) execution list; that his father had died on a battlefield of the Russo-Japanese War; that, at twelve, he was to be taken with a trainload of children to Siberia as a Communistic child-rearing experiment.

Utterly modern, entirely disillusioned, but not at all lacking in a warm, friendly interest in the human race, Auer furls his mournful eyelids and hopes that his success doesn't mean that he will have to attend Hollywood premieres. While he likes a lot of chi-chi about his dinner table —gold plates, fine porcelains, finer linens, he lives simply, dresses simply, and is entirely happy with his Canadian-born wife, the former Norma Tillman, and their three-year-old son, Tony.

"I didn't marry for love, you know," he answers a question. "I married for companionship. My wife is the grandest and the funniest person in the world. She clowns around as much as I do, and we're always laughing," continues Auer.

Mischa Auer has other claims to fame besides his recent film success. He is a grandson of the late Leopold Auer, Hungarian-born, Russian-naturalized violin instructor to Jascha Heifetz, Mischa Elman, Efram Zimbalist. More than that, with his parents' tragic deaths, his grandfather, who died in 1930, legally adopted him and Mischa assumed his name. Young Auer's real name is Ounskowski. His mother was Leopold Auer's daughter. Mischa, which is short for "Michael," has it figured out that he has Hungarian, Russian, Swedish and Jewish blood.

"Little Michael" was born in St. Petersburg. To this day Mischa (pronounced "Mee-sha") refuses to mention the city of his birth by any other name, although through successive political changes it has become Petrograd and Leningrad. In 1917, when he was twelve, the Red Revolution burst with all its horror upon Russia.

Mischa's family was "petty nobility." They were entitled to a crest and a crown with five prongs on it. Barons had seven prongs on their crowns; counts, nine. Tastefully, the Ounskowskis made no use of their small title, preferring to remain upper-class bourgeoisie. Nevertheless, when revolution broke, Mischa and his mother were immediately listed as aristocrats.

To make all men equal was the Communists' ideal, so, with a number of other children of aristocratic families, Mischa, at twelve, was hauled off to Siberia to be raised according to Communistic principles. Fortunately for the children, it was spring when this idea took form. Spring in Siberia is not as bad as winter in that far north land. It was bad enough, however.

But the children, as youngsters often do, became their own saviors. They snatched food as they could, robbed, stole, begged, and soon proved a nuisance to the very people who had high hopes for their transformation from little aristocrats to little Communists. They were soon bundled back onto a train and returned to their homes.

MISCHA'S joy at being again with his mother was short-lived. Soon they were fleeing for their lives. In the days of the Czarist regime, Madame Ounskowski had been active socially. One of her activities had been that of patroness for a musicale. The list of patrons had been headed by one of the Grand Dukes. Scouring about for signs of treason on the parts of their newly-created comrades, the Chekov discovered an old letterhead listing the sponsors of the musicale. The Grand Duke's name was enough to direct suspicion to the patrons and patronesses. Soon the police were searching for all persons whose names appeared on the letterhead.

Weeks later the Ounskowskis found themselves in Turkey. They made their way to Constantinople, then occupied by the British Expeditionary Forces. By the time he was fourteen, Mischa was serving the British Army. He was not actually fighting, but there was plenty of leg work the eager youngster could do in Constantinople.

His mother, too, soon founded a hospital on a nearby island in the Black Sea. It was for refugees, and Mischa joined her there. But the story of Mischa's life, which should ordinarily end on a fairly happy note, speeds on. In Mischa's fourteenth year typhus raged in Southern Europe. People died like flies. One of the victims was Mischa's mother.

Grief might have overwhelmed many a youngster of his age, but Mischa had long since stopped shedding tears. Crying was a waste of time in the midst of the colossal desolation that his generation had been born into. Mischa prepared to do the last thing he could for his mother . . . bury her. It was Sunday, and the Sabbath in Turkey is religiously celebrated. Not a shop was open. No one worked. He could get no dray to carry a casket to where his mother's body lay. He walked to the casket-maker's shop and carried his mother's casket home on his back. It was a muscle-tearing, heart-breaking task, but he did it.

Left alone in the midst of pestilence, Mischa thought how he might escape. A few jewels remained in his mother's belongings, which he sold. Then he found his way to Florence, Italy, where a girlhood friend of his mother's lived, married to a local attorney. They welcomed the haggard lad; fed him, clothed him, then cabled his grandfather, Leopold Auer, in New York. The music master sent for his orphaned grandson.

HERE, again, should come a happy ending to a terrible childhood, but, no. Grandpa Auer's secretary met the wrong boat, and Mischa was shunted into Ellis Island. Mischa's first impressions of America were not pretty. Characteristically, he holds nothing against anyone for that experience. Incredible episodes in his life have left him numb to trivial discomforts. Then, too, don't forget the natural fatalism of the Russians, "What is to happen, will happen, and nothing you can do will stop it . . ."

In New York, Mischa's life at last became that of the normal youngster. He enrolled in the Ethical Culture School, a private institution, concerned with progressive ideas in education. At nineteen Mischa went on the stage. That seemed to be his life work. Now he wants to become a director. He is not without experience in this work. In the East he conducted his own summer stock company, giving one-act plays. On Broadway, he appeared in "The Wild Duck," "The Riddle Woman," "The Kibitzer."

Touring with the Bertha Kallich players brought him to Los Angeles in 1928. Once there, he entered films; displayed villainy in "Lives of a Bengal Lancer," "Clive of India," and others. Now, under long-term contract, Universal has him doing a comedy Hamlet in a night club set-up, with a negro Greek chorus, interpolating and adding the syncopated note, in "Top of the Town." He recites the Soliloquy, and the skull is electrically lighted, the eye sockets blinking on and off. Mischa, with irony, relishes the idea immensely. Also, he relishes the part of the "ham" film actor that he is doing, at the same moment, for Hal Roach's "Pick a Star."

The Auers are naturalized American citizens. His favorite author is the typically American Gene Fowler. Auer's biggest surprise, besides that of his sudden picture popularity, came when an Eastern publisher turned down a lengthy version he had written about his hectic life. The publisher undoubtedly thought that he was exaggerating. That is exactly what Mischa would not bother to do. Why should he, when, in his case, truth is more devastating than fiction?

What made their hair grow?

Here is the Answer

"New Hair came after I began using Kotalko, and kept on growing," writes Mr. H. A. Wild. "In a short time I had a splendid head of hair, which has been perfect ever since."

Mary H. Little also has luxuriant hair now after using Kotalko. Yet for years her head, as she describes it, "was as bare as the back of my hand."

Many other men and women attest that hair has stopped falling excessively, dandruff has been decreased, new luxuriant hair growth has been developed where roots were alive, after using Kotalko to stimulate scalp action.

Are your hair roots alive but dormant? If so, why not use Kotalko? Encourage new growth of hair to live on sustenance available in your scalp. Kotalko is sold at drug stores everywhere.

Don't Talk About It—Do It!

fattening foods the same way. Don't jolt and jar your pampered system by a world-shaking change in diet right off.

I would say that two weeks after your big resolution goes into effect, you ought to be on a sensible reducing diet, sticking to it faithfully, and not minding it a particle. That means fruit or fruit juice, a slice of thin toast, and one cup of black coffee for breakfast. Clear soup and a salad for lunch. A dinner consisting of a decent-sized piece of broiled or roasted lean meat, two or three green vegetables—all you want of them—and a non-fattening dessert. According to the urgency of your weight-losing problem, you can tighten or slacken this diet schedule. If you're not such an enormous person, you can have a piece of pie or cake or a small dish of ice cream now and then or a couple of soft-boiled eggs at breakfast time.

THIN girls should be eating three healthy, nourishing meals a day and liking it. A breakfast of fruit, cereal with cream and sugar, two boiled or poached eggs (if you can eat eggs), a couple of slices of toast with butter and jam, and a beverage. Luncheon may be light, but must be nourishing. A thick soup. A salad of greens or mixed fruits. Or some hot dish instead of the salad, these cold days. A simple dessert and a glass of milk. Another glass of milk, or a malted drink with an egg beaten up in it, in the middle of the afternoon or when you leave the office. A dinner consisting of a soup, any broiled or roasted meat (and liver is good for you, if you're anaemic), two green vegetables with butter on them, a starch, a salad if you want it, and for dessert a light pudding, ice cream, plain cake, or custard. No coffee at night.

If you're worried about your complexion, remember that diet is half the battle. Green vegetables, fruit, and fruit juices should form the bulk of your diet, with a couple of glasses of milk every day if you're not a fat girl. Drink lots of water. Try cutting down to a minimum on coffee and cigarettes and see if that muddy look doesn't disappear like magic.

Please don't be lazy about cleansing your face thoroughly and meticulously before you go to bed. Most of the skin damage in this world is caused by dirt and ingrained make-up. And, aside from that, if your skin is over-dry, over-oily, or broken out, you should apply corrective measures to do good work for you while you're asleep. And that reminds me of a swell new beauty whats-it which has many virtues and no faults, as far as I can find. Maybe I'd better start a new paragraph on this, for I want to explain one small point rather carefully.

THERE'S an excellent cream and powder made by these people. Both the cream and powder have antiseptic, corrective qualities and are just the thing for you if you want to doctor your skin and at the same time, not have to go around looking like a fright without make-up. I have some samples of the powder which I will be glad to send to you. I haven't any samples of the cream, but would be glad to give you the name of it if you wish to buy it. It isn't expensive and it really is good—worth every penny.

Now here's what I want you to do, if you'd like a sample of the powder and the name of the cream: Fill in the coupon at the end of this article and address your request to Beauty Department, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. Leave off the Mary Marshall entirely. This is simply to speed up the handling of these requests. You needn't enclose return postage in your requests for this sample, either. No, remember that: if you want the sample, just fill in the coupon and paste it on a penny postcard, if you like, addressed to "Beauty Department," as I've told you. If you wish to write to me about other things, then address another letter to Mary Marshall and enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope. The powder, incidentally, comes in all the regular shades, so state what shade you desire. Use it just like any powder—but pul-leeze, pul-leeze, if your skin is in bad shape, use fresh bits of cotton to powder your face and toss away that grimy, if beloved, old puff. I know—I know— nothing gets powder on as slick and smooth as that dear old dilapidated lamb's wool puff, but you must expect to make some sacrifices in this world, you know.

Here I am, as usual, with eighteen things I want to talk about and insufficient time to do any one of them justice. But M. M. does want to say a thing or two about general grooming.

First, if your funds are limited, do everything you can do well enough all by yourself. Shampoos. Waves. Manicures. I'm not trying to put the beauty parlors out of business, but I do think, when you must count the pennies, that beauty parlor assistance should be saved for the time when you really need it. And then—and then, my hearties, don't skimp and pinch by going to a cheap, second-rate place. You can't economize on a permanent, as I've said five thousand times. But any gal can shampoo her own hair. And, if she's handy at all, she can learn to set a wave. She can get a professional manicure every two weeks, instead of every week, and keep her nails up to par herself in the interim. The too-common method is to dash to the manicurist of a Saturday afternoon—have beautiful looking mitts for two days—and then let the old wear and tear of soap and water or typewriter keys or what-have-you do their dirty work without attempting in the least to keep one's nails looking presentable. The cuticle oil made by that well-known manufacturer of manicure aids is grand for keeping the nails looking nice. The cream polishes are so easy to apply that you can change your polish frequently. Likewise, the various wave-sets will do wonders to help you keep a permanent in order—and you save that fifty or seventy-five cents every time you use it. The soapless shampoos are grand for the quick shampoos in between the thorough shampoos. The little net caps to wear to bed of nights will "save" a wave a surprisingly long time. Oh, yeah, sure, you read about these things in beauty columns and in the ads and you think, "I'll get one of those—some time. I'll do that—some time." Don't talk about it—do it!

ANOTHER point of general grooming: remember that others can see you from every angle. We're too much inclined to regard ourselves in one dimension only. Your hair, for example, may look swell, front view, with that bang, but scrutinize it carefully from a side view and don't wear the bang with a hat. If you have a roll curl at the back of your neck, make sure it doesn't cut you off too much—make you look as if you had no neck, in other words. Remember to blend the powder down into your neck when you powder your face. How many necks I do see of a slightly different shade from the face. It looks very odd, to others, even though you don't think of it yourself.

A little while back I said I was going to refer to the five gals on pages 52 and 53. Well, on further reflection, I don't know just exactly what helpful suggestions I can cull from them. They're picture people, after all, and they live in a picture world. They have advantages which you have not. But these few things may give you an inspiration or two.

The first time I met Olivia de Havilland, she was no more like the girl she is today than I'm like Shirley Temple. That quiet, rather mousey, not particularly well dressed youngster, is now an exquisite girl. You might think nothing could change those lovely soft brown eyes, but careful eyebrow grooming has enhanced them. And she has learned to speak more slowly. And she wears her hair off her face. These seem like small points, but they've definitely glamorized her personality. Olivia's hair is the same color it has always been and she doesn't wear a lot of goo and make-up off-screen. The changes she has made in herself have been natural, sensible changes.

I can say nothing in praise of young Beverly Roberts except that, one year ago, I'd never heard of her and now I know she's going places. The only answer to that is the amount of work the youngster has put in in one year. Dancing lessons, singing lessons, lessons in speech. And when she's not working, she's sitting on the set watching others work and learning what she can from them.

When Rosalind Russell started out to carve a career for herself, she chose one thing to specialize in. She wore good clothes. She realized sensibly that, though good-looking, she wasn't world-shakingly beautiful. She had faith in her own talents—but there are thousands of talented girls. So she concentrated on clothes and theatrical producers came to depend upon her when they wanted a smart, chic person, if it were only for a "bit." And now, as you can see for yourself, Roz ain't playing bits no mo'.

Gail Patrick has always been a really strikingly good-looking girl, but nobody paid much attention to her until recently. I think it's because she has pared off all trimmings from her clothes and has made her coiffure rather simple and severe.

And, finally, my chillun, Alice "Cutiepie" Faye offers a small hint to all small, cute, cuddly girls. Alice is still small, cute and cuddly, but changing the violent platinum hair to a more believable shade has helped to make her sweeter—more—well, I guess "refined" is the only word.

The Farmer Takes the Show

important enough to her to stand all this, Frances said, after she wrote an essay in her sophomore year at high school.

"It was entitled 'God Dies'," she chuckled, "and won me the disapproval of the faculty and students, while I was thoroughly ostracized from the Epworth League. But the really important thing I won was a hundred dollars from the Scholastic Journal for my brain-wave. I decided then and there to become a writer. And," she added with a grin, "since I made up my mind at this time to write nothing but classics, I thought a college education might be a help."

But a position on the college paper changed the course of her ambitions. In a dramatic review she criticized a college play so thoroughly that the irate leading lady suggested that Miss Farmer try to do as well. So in the next college play Miss Farmer did considerably better. And from then on she devoted every spare moment to dramatics.

And how, we wondered, did Frances have time to find a spare moment?

"Well, I saved time in different ways," she explained. "I didn't join any organizations for one thing. Even the dramatic ones, after I found that hours were spent consuming tea and speculating on what the 'theatah' was coming to. I was regarded as kind of peculiar around the campus, I guess, because I didn't waste time doing anything I didn't want to."

We asked how it felt to go back to Seattle as a successful moving picture actress when "Come And Get It" was previewed there. Frances and all the principals were sent up there by the studio, you know, when the picture had its world premiere.

"It was an awful experience," was Frances' surprising answer. "A mere handful of people knew me when I left town, and then I came back to find fans swarming all over the place. It does something to you. You wonder how people can get like that. Of course, I had my real friends there, but the ones who made the greatest demonstration were those who had barely known I was in existence previously.

BUT that's what this picture business does," she continued thoughtfully, "they 'go Hollywood' all over the country in connection with movies. I know they expected me to turn up looking pretty glamorous, and even though I looked just like I did when I left, they were convinced that I must have changed in some mysterious way. And the truth of the matter is, that I'm just as I was at that time—rather bad at clothes, pretty sloppy, and forgetting to put any make-up on half the time. And I still drive my rattle-trap car, live in a very modest house, do most of my own housework, and haven't gone to a night club yet."

Lots of things had happened to Frances since she left her home town a year ago. She had traveled 12,000 miles to make that 1200 mile trip from Seattle to the film capital. The detour had been to Russia, —a trip won through a Seattle newspaper contest.

"But I really went to Russia to get to New York—and ended up in Hollywood!" she laughed. "You see, when the opportunity came for this trip it looked like a long shot to me, because I'd been dying to try out the New York stage ever since my first interest in dramatics."

A communist paper in Seattle had offered the prize for the best essay written by a Washington student. The winner was to cover the May Day celebrations in Moscow and come back to enlighten the university students on the joys of being a Red.

"But I'm afraid I was rather a bad bet," Frances said ruefully. "Guess I developed into too much of a radical, because I not only failed to come back and spread the light, but I didn't come back at all."

On the boat she met a man who arranged a screen test in New York for her and suddenly Frances found herself in Hollywood under contract.

"I'm still a little vague about the whole thing," she said. "The entire trip took less than three months and I really didn't Richard Dix tells the Missus a good one at the Zukor Anniversary dinner. They're a seldom publicized but very happy couple. Mrs. Dix's coiffure has a flight of birds across the front—very fetching realize how much fun I'd had until I got back and had time to think about it. It wasn't exactly a de luxe trip," she added, "since I went by bus to New York and third class all the way, but it seemed like a millionaire set-up to me."

FRANCES isn't a bit sorry that Hollywood was her stop instead of New York, though she still has one main ambition in life and that is to act on the New York stage. She's under a six-year contract at the studio and in that time feels that she will receive invaluable training for her ultimate goal.

From the first day at the studio Frances Farmer was regarded as someone to be reckoned with. Not because she showed signs of genius or temperament, but because she had all the marks of being an individual—who intended to stay that way. Invitations to night spots, premieres and other festivities were turned down by Frances right and left, with the announcement that she preferred her own company to most of the young men around town and vastly preferred a good book to a good drink. The studio tore its hair—how were they to get this new actress in the gossip columns if she spent her evenings with books—and particularly good ones?

Frances also let the publicity department know that she would not pose for bathing suit pictures known as "leg art" in the Hollywood vernacular—and the studio's sure-fire method of getting new actresses in the papers.

"Marlene Dietrich didn't refuse," she was told icily.

"'Legs Dietrich' has a definitely more glamorous sound than 'Legs Farmer'," responded Frances equally icily.

"Ha!" said the publicity department, "then we'll change your name to something more enticing. How about Lotta Latour? Then you'd be known as Legs Latour—how's that, eh?"

"Thanks," said Frances, "but when I get ready to change my name I'll do it myself." And the next week she did just that. Much to the consternation of the studio's harassed publicity department, she quietly eloped to Yuma one week-end with another Paramount player—a six-foot-four Viking named Leif Erikson.

Hollywood is perhaps the most blasé town in the world, but this elopement caused genuine surprise. For it had been just a short time since Frances had announced herself as entirely unimpressed by the masculine element in Hollywood.

"I prefer my own company," she had said, "to the company of any young men in this town. I certainly don't care for the crop of boys who arrived to show me the town on my arrival."

Then came the morning a couple of weeks later when Frances Farmer changed her mind. Late for work, she and her Ford came tearing up the street and turned in to the Paramount gates. So did another car, coming as fast and rattling as hard. With a screeching of brakes the two antiquated models skidded to a standstill and their respective drivers turned to glower at each other.

"Seems to me you could look where—" the handsome young man in the other car began growling.

"Well, it seems to me," began Frances in her most ominous voice.

There was a deafening toot of horns and the two turned to look angrily at the cars lined up behind them—all limousines with disdainful chauffeurs. Leif began grinning and Frances' mouth quivered. Then they looked at each other and burst into helpless laughter.

"Go ahead!" said Leif, waving Frances through the gate. "But wait for me!" he yelled after her.

It wasn't the March wind that chilled him...'twas the touch of her dry, chapped Hands

IT HURT WHEN JIM SAID he hated rough hands. Mine were chapped and harsh all winter — kind of old-looking — but what could I do?

THEN... MY SISTER TOLD ME Jergens Lotion keeps a girl's hands soft because it goes down into the skin. Now I use Jergens, too, and Jim says, "Your soft little hands keep my heart."

HANDS need Special Moisture inside the skin cells

YOUR hands chap and roughen when the skin cells lose their moisture. This moisture easily dries out—from wind, cold or water. And most women have their hands in water up to sixteen times a day.

But Jergens Lotion saves the young beauty of your hands because it restores the lost moisture. It goes into the skin cells better than any other lotion tested.

The two famous ingredients in Jergens are the same as skin specialists use to soften and whiten skin. Your first application smooths roughnesses, soothes chapping. Use Jergens faithfully and you'll soon have charming hands your man will love. Jergens leaves no stickiness. Only 50¢, 25¢, 10¢—$1.00 for the big bottle—in any drug, department or 10-cent store.

Sinks into the skin more completely than other lotions tested—soon gives back youth-giving moisture.

Hollywood's debutante set is a very active crowd. Billiards is a favorite evening pastime—here are Barbara Pepper and Anne Shirley showing how it's done in sister act effect.

"And from that minute to this, we've had grand times together," said Frances. "Working or loafing we seem to get along like the best of friends. Of course, I suppose any girl could get along with Leif—but I'm glad I was the one to get the chance!"

Leif Erikson had been under contract to the studio just a few months longer than Frances. With music his main interest in life, he had started out as soloist with Ted Fio Rito's famed orchestra in San Francisco. Then he was offered a role in Max Reinhardt's production of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" in the Hollywood Bowl and after touring with this company for several months was signed by Paramount. He had played small roles in several pictures, but was still taking dramatic instruction from Phyllis Loughton, the studio's coach, when he met Frances. It developed that Frances was studying, too. From that time on they arranged to be rehearsal partners.

"We were terribly serious about our work," said Frances, "even to devoting our evenings to practicing our roles for the next day's lessons. One night Leif came over to my apartment with a script. We started in with too much enthusiasm, though," she added with that low, merry laugh so typical of Frances. "It called for me to berate him in no uncertain tones. I did this with such dramatic fervor that we didn't hear the pounding on the door until it was suddenly opened and in streamed half a dozen tenants. They told Leif either to act like a gentlman or leave the place at once!"

It was a month after their first meeting that the two decided on their Yumatrimonial trip. They drove to the little Arizona desert town one week-end and were quietly married by the justice of peace.

"It was a terrifying experience to have such a fuss made over our marriage when we returned," Frances said. "But even if I was in Hollywood I wanted to marry the man I loved. I just can't exactly see this idea of giving up matrimony because it might cause a slump in your fan mail."

In spite of the tumult and shouting, the Eriksons went about finding themselves a home. They chose a small place in Laurel Canyon, close to Hollywood, and set up housekeeping.

"That is after a fashion," amended Frances. "Our first investment wasn't an overstuffed set for the living-room but a rather rickety second-hand boat so we could explore the neighboring sea coast. You see, Leif comes from sea-faring people—his father was commander of a fleet of ships in the North Pacific. And I'm crazy about anything to do with the wild waves—the wilder the better."

That's what Frances thought, but the studio thought it plain reckless, particularly after these two collided with an oil tanker one dark and windy night, and had to be rescued by a fishing barge when their skiff capsized.

There are clauses in studio contracts, you know, which prevent players from doing anything that might prove hazardous to their careers. The Eriksons were reminded of this little legal technicality and the suggestion was made that they get rid of the boat. So they traded it in for a motorcycle. With a side-car attached they planned to take week-end jaunts into the desert and mountains and sleep under the stars.

"Leif had never driven a motorcycle before, so I was a little surprised to see him drive up in it the first day," Frances explained. "However, we went on a grand ride and enjoyed ourselves immensely."

The next day when they drove merrily to work in it, the subject of clauses was again brought up. Needless to say, the Eriksons and their motorcycle parted company.

"It really doesn't matter to us, anyhow," she laughed, "because we can have just as good a time in a hundred other ways. Fortunately, we both like the same things—hiking and swimming and pot-luck suppers with friends, or just dashing off to the movies. Simple things, all of them, and stupid compared to Hollywood's ideas of a big time. But we like to go our own way.

"In fact," said Frances Farmer thoughtfully, "I don't think my husband, my marriage or myself are in any danger of 'going Hollywood.'" concerts. She opened a door for me and, although she blinded my young eyes with the light she let through, she did show me that light."

She's in Debt

Gladys paused a moment, her dark head bent in thought. Frank Chapman said, "The football players come next. Don't forget them."

"You were a football player yourself," laughed Gladys, her laughter loving him, "a football player turned singer. But before the football players there was the flutist—"

"We will not discuss the flutist," said Frank, firmly. "There is nothing romantic about a flutist."

"But he was the very best flutist," pleaded Gladys.

"The flutist is out," affirmed Frank. The flutist was out. But in the tender mockery in the eyes that Gladys turned upon her husband, I gathered that the flutist, though blue-pencilled, had contributed some color to the girlhood memories which Gladys Swarthout remembers today.

THE football players, then," smiled Gladys, "accomplished a paradox in my life. They nearly ruined my career forever and, at one and the same time, they gave me my career.

"It was like this: I was a football fan, the most rabid of the species. I never missed a game. At every game, of course, I yelled my lungs out. I screamed until my throat was scraped raw. I not only went to all the games, with first one football hero and then another, but I also went to the dances and parties afterward. I neglected my practicing. Miss Vickers, my mother and sister were frantic. They saw my career going down in the dust of the football field. They began to take action. They did take action and so . . ."

"And so you really owe your voice, your career to your football players," supplied Frank. "Had it not been for them and the danger that threatened your voice, you might have remained indefinitely in Kansas City and on the concert platform."

"That is true," Gladys said. "And then comes the Harroun family. This wealthy Kansas City family, two sisters and a brother, believed in me to such an extent that they backed me financially. They sent me to Chicago to study. They sent not only me, but my mother and sister as well. They spared no expense and imposed no restrictions. I have repaid the financial debt in full. On the night I made my debut at the 'Met' I signed the check which cleared my monetary debt to them. But the debt of friendship, the debt I owe them for their belief in me, goes on my list of forever unpaid debts. One of the sisters passed away just before I went back to Kansas City to sing. This very morning a wire came telling me that the other sister is gone. So, tonight, I am trying to repay that debt a little in my thoughts, in my memory, in my heart. Even though they are gone, the debt remains. Perhaps I can repay it only by realizing that I never can, if you know what I mean."

Eddy-MacDonald fans! Here's a perfectly grand shot of your favorites from "Maytime." Nelson looks unusually handsome and Jeanette is charming in the costumes of the period.

A silence fell on the quiet room. The butler removed the tea things. Gladys rose and sat, curled on the fireside stool, her back to the flames.

She continued, "Oddly enough, the man who is now President of Paramount Pictures is my next creditor. He gave me my first job on any stage, in Chicago, in the movie houses of which he was the head. I acted, danced and sang. For years I was ashamed to talk about this, I think it was because my mother, a very strict churchgoer, felt that pictures, dancing, acting in a theatre were in the nature of a sin. At any rate, to Mr. Balaban, who has doubtless forgotten all about it, I owe my first job. I also owe to him the opportunity to take two days leave of absence so that I might go to Minneapolis and sing with the Minneapolis Symphony. His understanding the willingness to give an 'employee' a chance when that chance presented itself, was something to be thankful for.

"Don't forget Mr. Rider," reminded Frank.

"Oh, I won't. Mr. Rider knew everyone connected with music in Chicago, and he saw to it that I met them, too. He dragged me almost literally by the hair of my head, to the Chicago Auditorium, the 'Met' of Chicago, to have an audition. I protested every inch of the way. I still held fast to my vision of opera—some day. But that was still very far in my future, I thought. I didn't know one operatic role. Nevertheless, he took me. I sang arias. I was engaged. That summer I learned twenty-three operatic roles. So to Mr. Rider I owe the debt of making my vision not just a nebulous thing, but a definite one. He made me realize that there is no time like the present. His insistence that I have that audition actually opened the gates of opera for me.

DURING that first season in Chicago, I sang with Mary Garden and Chaliapin and, oh, the debts I owe to them! At that time I knew very little about dramatics. What with learning all my roles and rehearsing them and studying languages, I had no time to be coached in the acting end of it. And to Miss Garden I owe what I learned then. She took such an interest in me. She advised me to watch every rehearsal I was not in so that I might learn what not to do.

"The first stand-in part I ever had was for her. She was singing 'The Love of Three Kings.' There was a scene where the King had to lift her from a marble bench, dead, and carry her from the stage. She had to be limp, her hands flopping lifelessly. She wanted to see how a limp body would look. She asked me to do the role for her while she sat out front and observed. I did it. To Mary Garden I owe the debt of thoroughness.

To the one and only Chaliapin, I owe the sense of responsibility, the debt," laughed Gladys Swarthout, "of being nervous every time I step onto the opera stage, the concert platform, a movie set or into a broadcasting station. You may say that this is a sorry debt and one not to be valued. Oh, no.

"You see, that first season in opera, in Chicago, I was never nervous on the stage. I sang more roles than anyone has ever sung in any one season, I believe. Not a tremor did I have. It was the casualness of youth, I suppose. It was a matter of where there was no sense there was no feeling. Whatever the reason, I had no sense of stage fright, no self-consciousness, no pit-of-the-stomach fear.

"One night when I was about to go on as Siebel with Chaliapin, in 'Faust.' I was standing by waiting for my cue when I saw Chaliapin pacing up and down, off-stage, shaking, his face green. I was afraid. I thought he had been taken ill. I asked someone what ailed him. I was told that was Chaliapin, that he was always nervous before he went on, so nervous that he shook, because he felt that he must sustain his previous attainments. He felt the full sense of that great responsibility. And I remember standing there, realizing that I was learning a new lesson. For there was the great Chaliapin, shaking, nervous lest he fail, and there was I, cool, casual, romping confidently onto the stage.

"From that night on, I have been nervous before every performance, of every kind, everywhere. I suffer stage fright. I suffer from a sense of responsibility, not so much to myself as to my cast, to my audiences. Chaliapin taught me that only out of pain can you give the best that is in you.

"Do you see what I mean?" Gladys asked. "Do you see how little I am myself, alone? I am made up of component parts, each part given to me by the people who have been my donors. I am simply the sum total of the gifts they have given me."

WITH her eyes on the eyes of Frank Chapman, who gave her an affirmative nod, she continued, "I owe a debt I can never repay to the man who was my first husband. He was older than I and so very wise. I owe him a debt which can never be cancelled—not on this earth because he is gone. He gave me the gift of believing utterly in myself and in the gift he felt that I had to give to the world. No sacrifice was too great for him to make for that gift. I might easily, when I married, have given up my career. He would not let me do this. He gave me the humble conviction that my career was not a thing to be sold for gold, but a trust imposed upon me, a faith I must keep.

"I owe to Frank, perhaps more than anything else, the debt of knowing that the living of life is good—a life in which everything is shared. For we do share everything, our work, our ambitions, our plans and problems and even our innermost thoughts. Frank cured me of my inhibitions."

Frank, at this point, muttered something about a phone call which had to be made and departed. Gladys said, smiling, "He needn't be modest and retiring about it. It's all true. He gives me our home life which is peaceful, normal and organized. I can't imagine what it would be like to be alone, so absolutely are we together in everything. We work every morning from nine until twelve. An accompanist comes in and we take turns in our practicing.

We lunch together and discuss our mornings' work, in detail. In the afternoons we play tennis or golf, ride, go shopping or just sit in the sun and talk. We never seem to tire of talking endlessly, together. We always go shopping together. I wouldn't dream of buying a frock or even a pair of gloves unless Frank were with me. I bought five hats, alone, sort of by accident, last week, and Frank sent every one of them back—but every one. We like the same people, have the same friends. We entertain at dinner and dine out. Usually with the Fredric Marches, Grace Moore and her husband, Rhea Gable, or the Bob Montgomerys.

"People argue about whether there is such a thing as the truly good life," said Gladys Swarthout with the happy smile of the woman who is content. "I owe Frank the debt of knowing that there is—because we live it together."

THERE are our friends in Hollywood, new friends who have become old friends already. Gloria Swanson, for instance, has been a friend. She has given us her sound knowledge of the business in all of its complicated phases. She has helped us work out our problems. She has introduced us to her friends who have become our friends also.

"I owe Marlene Dietrich a debt, too, for when we first went to Paramount she was friendly and welcoming. She was always popping in and out of our dressing-room with little gifts—flowers and home-made cakes she made herself. She went out of her way to make us feel at home."

"She often," contributed Frank, who had returned by this time, "would stand with me outside the door when Gladys was recording. I have seen her eyes fill with

"Outdoor Skin"
SMOOTH IN A SECOND
POND'S

...Then Make-up's Smart

A SWELL TIME in the out of doors is no reason for a skin all scuffed and flaky looking for your swanky evening date.

There's a simple way popular girls know—to get rid of all those little flaky bits that spoil skin for make-up. A special kind of cream that actually melts off horrid "powder catchers"—in just one application!

Here's how a distinguished dermatologist explains it:

"Exposure hastens the drying out of surface skin cells. They shrink, scuff loose. The skin feels harsh. These particles can be melted away instantly with a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream). Then the smooth, underlying cells appear."

See this for yourself—with Pond's Vanishing Cream.

Before make-up — Right after cleansing put on a film of Pond's Vanishing Cream. It smooths away every flaky bit. Now powder and rouge go on evenly. Stay for hours.

Overnight—Apply Pond's Vanishing Cream after your nightly cleansing. Leave it on. As you sleep, your skin gets softer.

Mrs. William L. Mellon, Jr.

says: "After Pond's Vanishing Cream, powder goes on evenly and stays looking fresh. I use it overnight, too, after cleansing."

Why skin feels "flaky"

Dead cells on the top of your skin are dried out by exposure, flake off. You can melt them smooth.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE...

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

The Best GRAY HAIR Remedy is Made at Home

You can now make at home a better gray hair remedy than you can buy, by following this simple recipe: To half pint of water add one ounce bay rum, a small box of Barbo Compound and one-fourth ounce of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it yourself at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained.

Barbo imparts color to streaked, faded or gray hair, makes it soft and glossy and takes years off your looks. It will not color scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.

tears as she said, 'If only I could sing like that!"

"There is Jan Kiepura," grinned Frank. "Don't forget him. All right, I'll say it for you. Your only outburst of temperament was caused by him. You should really acknowledge that debt, you know."

"Oh," said Gladys, "perhaps we shouldn't—but you see, we'd been having such difficulties with 'Give Us This Night.' Kiepura kept going up on his lines and going up. We shot one scene sixty-four times and he went up every time. I was tired and I finally lost control. I stood there on the sound stage and for the first time in my life, I went prima-donnaish. I shouted, I'm afraid, and said that we were not children but adults who were getting good money for what we were doing and that it was up to us to do it and that if we didn't I would walk off the stage and the scene would never be taken. The next take was a take!

"We owe Hollywood many debts, really. A debt of gratitude for the lovely home life it gives us, for me—" Gladys looked at Frank and laughed.

"Gladys means for the checks she receives," prompted Frank. "She still can't believe it's true. Each one is a new surprise to her."

"Do you wonder that I say I am in debt? Head over heels in debt? Do you wonder, now, that I asked a little help of you and of MODERN SCREEN in helping us to repay our debts which can never be cancelled while we are alive?"

Gladys Swarthout has paid her debts but she is lovelier because she doesn't know it.

and intrigue. I wanted to be a Mata Hari, if necessary. I wanted to be enmeshed in international conspiracies. If this did not work out, I wanted to be an actress. Either career seemed to me then, as now, the most colorful, most vital, most powerful life I could discover for myself.

"And power is what I want," said the beautiful Madeleine. "I wanted it then. I want it now. My ambition for power has never changed. I knew that I could never be content to be a wife and mother and nothing else. There are many women who are satisfied with wifehood and motherhood, and more power to them. But I am, whether fortunately or unfortunately, not made that way. I want children, of course, but I want my career, too.

"But my father's wish compelled me to continue my studies. He was a teacher of languages and his dearest dream was that I might win such scholastic honors that, eventually, I might attend the Sorbonne in Paris from which he had graduated."

Madeleine didn't attend the Sorbonne, but she was a precocious child and she did win an entrance to Birmingham University at an age when most girls are looking ahead to high school. After receiving a Bachelor of Arts degree from Birmingham, establishing a brilliant record in the study of French, and, more than incidentally, an equally brilliant record in university theatricals, she accepted a teaching position in a girls' seminary at Brighton.

"I kept my bargain with my father," Madeleine was saying, "to enter the field of pedagogy for a year. And, then, the year about up, and lacking as much as the seven dollars railway fare needed to take me to London, I answered an ad in a newspaper for a tutor and got the job. My pupils were the six children of a secondhand clothing dealer. My salary was three dollars and fifty cents a week. I worked just long enough to be able to get to London and to keep myself there for a few weeks.

"I went to London to be an actress. I went, also, to privations, discouragements, actual hunger. I know what it is to live on 'fish and chips.' I know what it is not even to have 'fish and chips.' I ate only when I couldn't stand the pangs of hunger any longer. When I was literally down to my last cent, I landed a small role in a play called, fittingly, 'The Lash,' which was being cast for a tour of the provinces. My salary was fifteen dollars a week. When the company disbanded, after appearing in third-class theatres almost everywhere, I modeled hats while waiting for another stage job.

I TRAMPED the streets of London between hats. I made the rounds of agents and producers. I was too thinly clad. I was hungry. I was friendless. I looked as I look now, perhaps a bit spiritualized from lack of sustenance. No one cared. I didn't care either. I didn't care because I was living at the quick. Hunger and loneliness and fear and job hunting, even discouragement and despair, are basic emotions. They are the prods and pressures of necessity and necessity is life. I was far happier than I was in the days when I had had my snug little weekly salary at school, my board and keep.

"I want to live while I am alive," Madeleine told me. "I want to live dynamically, dangerously. I'd rather starve than stagnate.

"It was Seymour Hicks, the actor-producer, who finally gave me the job that started me. He coached me and gave me increasingly important roles in his touring company. When I had a bid to play opposite Robert Lorraine in London, he graciously gave me permission to accept the part. It was during rehearsals that, one of one hundred and fifty applicants, I made my first screen test and was chosen for the leading role in a screen drama called, 'Guns of Loos.' I next made 'The First Born,' directed by Myles Mandets. This was, undoubtedly, the real turning point of my career. Then the fan mail began to come in and the British fans became Carroll-conscious.

"I've never been hungry again," smiled Madeleine over her vegetable luncheon. "I did many stage plays. I made for the screen 'What Money Can Buy,' 'The Crooked Billet,' 'School for Scandal,' 'Young Woodley,' 'I Was a Spy,' 'The 39 Steps,' 'The Secret Agent,' and others. Then I came to Hollywood.

"If you really want to know what an ex-British school teacher thinks of Hollywood," smiled Madeleine, "it is that everything which has been said about it and a great deal which has been thought about it are false.

"Yes, the glamor of Hollywood has been stressed. One hears of the gay parties, gay people, vast and incredible sums of money, swimming pools, fantastic people living fantastic lives. Hollywood money. Hollywood hysteria. Hollywood madness.

But that is not Hollywood at all—not as a British school teacher sees it.

"I see Hollywood," said Madeleine trenchantly, "as the seat of great power. I see it as a power which might be used in almost any way, any direction. I see it as a mighty and muscular hand with ability to shape and guide and mediate peoples and problems and policies—everywhere. I see it as an influence, the substantial weight and strength of which has never been used or tried. I see Hollywood as a supreme world dictator, a dominant and controlling force.

"We, on the screen, have a far greater power, I think, than we have fully realized or half used."

"You mean," I said doubtfully, "political power?"

"It could be used for that," said Madeleine. "It could be used in almost any way we might choose to use it. Most of us have chosen to use it only in the emotional sense.

"When I was in England recently, I accepted an offer to tour and lecture in cinema theatres in Northern England. I spoke of political matters, of war and peace. The reaction which I got from that brief experience was fiercely illuminating. I got that reaction because I was Madeleine Carroll, screen actress, whom the power, prestige and the press of Hollywood had made an international figure. I could have stood, my whole life through, on school platforms and given my heart and brain away and never have achieved half of what I did achieve as Madeleine Carroll from Hollywood.

IT has often been a source of amazement to me that the fans do not resent us, especially after the recent difficult years when, impoverished, the world might well resent Hollywood and its denizens, their affluence, their luxuries, their opulent housing and gowning and furring and jewelling. But I am beginning to understand. They do not resent us because they feel that we belong to them. Our luxury is their luxury; they share it with us. Our loves are their loves. I am accessible to the millions of men who see me. To the millions of girls who see Robert Taylor, Clark Gable, Gary Cooper they are their boy friends, too. They may, if they wish, be in their arms. They belong to them. One does not turn upon one's own. One rejoices and shares in the common fortune.

"No," laughed Madeleine, "this school teacher cannot be prissy about Hollywood. This school teacher is not a bit ashamed of being a movie actress, she is proud of it. I boast about it. I feel not only its glory but its power.

"I find it a warm and generous place. In England, if a man, say, loses his job or if he produces a play and it is a failure, his friends will rally around him, stand him a drink, clap him on the shoulder, be comradely and helpful. But if that man gets a substantial raise, puts on a play that wows the town, his friends will avoid him, look the other way, give hollow praise if at all.

"Hollywood is just the reverse. Hollywood helps, but it looks the other way when there is failure. Hollywood is the only place I know of which does not rejoice at failure. Hollywood is with you when you are successful, proud of your success.

"I see no petty jealousy in Hollywood. I have seen no back-biting, no mean rivalry, no knives hurled in the dark. Everyone seems to bask contentedly, even joyously, in the success of everyone else. Time and again I've heard one star say of another, 'His new picture is terrific—he's great in it!' No, I am sure, a Jean Harlow doesn't envy a Myrna Loy; a Myrna Loy doesn't resent the success of a Garbo. On the contrary, each seems to bask in the sunlight of the other's place in the sun. There seems to be elbow room for everyone in Hollywood. And if there isn't room someone will graciously move over and make room.

"I have been asked," smiled Madeleine, "whether I really mean all the nice things I say about Hollywood or whether I say them 'for effect.' I do mean them. I have racked my brains to try to find some fault with it, some criticism that will add a dash of vinegar to the sugar.

I SEE no silly, conceited popinjays strutting about Hollywood. I see about me, everywhere, hard-working, earnest, intelligent young men and women, older men and women. All of them seem singularly unaware of their beauty, their fame, their glamor. They do not behave as 'professional charmers.' I think," laughed Madeleine, "that this can be explained by the fact that so many of them have arrived in Hollywood via a long and bitter route. They didn't suddenly, with a wave of the wand, become the Dietrichs and Colberts and Lombards of today. They aren't too vain of their beauty because they were beautiful, too, in the days when no one cared. No one was blinded by their beauty. It took Hollywood to frame them and hang them on the wall for all the world to see.

"I can't imagine complaining about anything in Hollywood. I have heard a few complaints because of being asked to be on the set at seven in the morning or after dinner at night, perhaps. What of it? I wouldn't complain if I were asked to be on the set at five in the morning and to do a little dusting while I waited. I'm getting paid, well paid for my work. Far too well paid to make any complaints of any sort about anything.

"And Hollywood is so grateful. Hollywood bears out my mother's teaching that graciousness pays its dividends. Grateful because, they say, it is 'gracious' of me to be always on time, never to keep cast or director waiting, never to complain about long hours.

"I see Hollywood as a place generous in every respect. There are no rigid 'clicques' out here. Nor have I seen any of the 'wild parties,' the bawdy revels of which outsiders, at least in the past, heard so much and suspected so much more. If any such orgies do go on I have been rigorously excluded. And I don't think this is the case. If anything, the tempo is a bit unexciting. We all have charming homes and charming home lives, plenty of sun and sea and air and tennis and books and friends. At most of the parties to which I go we play Monopoly or word games, we sit and talk, we swim or play tennis.

SOME of us—and I am one—have to undergo long-distance marriages, which is unfortunate. I am peculiarly fortunate even in this in that I am married to the most understanding man in the world."

And I thought, then, of the romantic engagement of the lovely Madeleine Carroll and Captain Philip Astley. I thought of the marriage of the beautiful Madeleine and the dashing Captain, a marriage which took place at the Captain's villa on Lake Como, the moon of Italy rising on their nuptials. I thought of how Madeleine was presented at Court, and of the castle they have bought in Spain where they spend their leisure moments together.

"We have," Madeleine was saying, "rather a perfect marriage. When we were first married, you see, Philip made me a most generous settlement—an extraordinary one, too, since it has no strings attached to it. It goes on for life, whether we are together or apart. And when I began to make money, not wishing to be outdone in the matter of the 'beau geste,' I had it so arranged that all of my money is paid over to Philip. I never even see my own checks. My manager gets them, sends them direct to Philip, and I live on the settlement my husband made me as I would do if I were nonprofessional. This saves us, I think, from the problem which wrecks so many professional marriages—the problem of the husband being submerged by his wife's financial supremacy. Philip has more money than I. My money is handled and invested by him. He explains what is done with it, though I never ask, of course, and that is that.

"Despite the inconvenience of our enforced separations, Philip wants me to keep on with my career. He knows me. He says to me frequently, 'With your vitality you must have something to do, something vitally interesting and your own. If you didn't, you might get into mischief. I would prefer you to have your career in which I, too, can take so keen an interest.'

"He knows," said Madeleine, "the child who wanted to be the torch!

"Even our separations," she said after a moment, "constitute more living than if we were sharing a flat, a house, an estate, drinking coffee together every morning, dining in or out every night. I am omniverous when it comes to living keenly, sharply. I would rather be fiercely in pain than flatly at peace. I would rather know the suffering of love than the satiety of love. I am," smiled Madeleine, her gray eyes star sapphires with fire in their depths, "a Latin at heart, you see."

I said, "Yes, I see." But I didn't.

The Things They Want to Forget

hopeless. The people who were employing him told Bert they wouldn't keep him any longer. His studio told Bert that they wouldn't permit this man within their gates.

Bert gave his friend his fare to New York. His heart was chilled with sorrow as he did so. He was sure now that there was no hope for this man. Bert would like to forget that bitter failure of his, but there is nothing on earth that can wipe out the memory of the man whom he once called friend, and in whom he once believed.

GLENDA FARRELL also has her bitter memories, memories she finds it hard even to talk about. Many times love has failed her, but bitterest of all her memories is the time she failed love. There was a stage actor whom she loved in the days before she ever dreamed of Hollywood, and whom she foolishly cast out of her life.

She was such an idealistic person, this young Glenda. Too idealistic perhaps. She believed that people in love ought to have eyes for no one but each other. It was inconceivable to her that a man who loved one woman could be tempted by another.

When Jimmy (that wasn't his real name, of course) had to go out on a road tour, they promised each other that they would never "date" anyone else. Glenda kept that promise, preferring to sit at home twiddling her thumbs rather than break her word, for that would be betraying their love for each other, she thought

While Jimmy was on the road, rumors began drifting back to Glenda. Rumors that Jimmy, her Jimmy, was being attentive to another girl in the company. Her head held high, Glenda laughed at those rumors. She couldn't and wouldn't believe them.

Then Jimmy came back, and eagerly asked permission to call on Glenda. While he sat in her room, trying to tell her how much he loved her, her 'phone rang. A shiver ran down her back as the voice of a strange woman asked for Jimmy.

Jimmy's voice was annoyed when he answered. "I can't speak to you," he told the girl impatiently. "I told you I couldn't see you in New York."

The woman's voice, warm and gushing, persisted. Jimmy hung up.

Then he turned to Glenda. Her eyes were darkened by a fleeting shadow, and her little pointed face was drawn with pain.

"Glenda," he said, "I swear this is the truth. I went out with her a few times on the road. I couldn't help it. I told her that it was you and only you I cared about."

He was evidently telling the truth, for other people in his company told Glenda the same story. It wasn't his fault really. And yet—

She refused to consider Jimmy as a suitor after that. With pretended lightheartedness she laughed at him, when he tried to make love to her. She closed that chapter of her life forever, and never turned the page back upon that romance.

"Now I realize," she told me, "that I acted like an idealistic child, and that I gave up a romance that might have meant something for an ideal I had created out of thin air."

Bela Lugosi's is one of the saddest regrets of all.

"If I could forget just one thing," Bela Lugosi said—and I have never seen a man look as he looked at that moment, wild with regret and wretchedness— "I would try to forget the way I treated my mother. For ten years I never wrote her a line. I left Hungary filled with bitterness against my country. I was furious at the injustice I thought I had suffered. You see, I had had an important position there in the National Theatre. Then I helped the Revolutionists. They failed, and so, I was fired from my job as an actor. I should have reasoned that I had taken that chance and I should have taken my medicine like a man. But I didn't. When I left Hungary, I decided to turn my back forever upon my native country. I would have nothing further to do with it.

"Of course, I didn't deliberately decide never to write to my mother. But that made no difference. Intentions aren't what count in this world. I thought that in some vague, indefinite future I would write her of my life in this New World. But I kept on postponing that letter. It was never written.

"Ten years after I left Hungary, I re-

CLEARS UP ADOLESCENT PIMPLES

AFTER the start of adolescence, from about 13 to 25, or even longer, important glands develop and final growth takes place. The entire body is disturbed. The skin, especially, gets oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin. Pimples break out.

Fleischmann's fresh Yeast clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Then—with the cause removed—the pimples go!

Just eat 3 cakes daily—a cake about ½ hour before each meal —plain, or in a little water, until your skin clears. Start now!

ceived a letter from my sister. In it, she said simply, 'Mother has just died. Her last words were, "Why doesn't Bela write? Why hasn't he ever written?"'

"There were no reproaches in that letter. Only my mother's last words. They were enough. They have been branded on my heart ever since. I would forget them if I could, forget my own unintentional cruelty to her. But I know that I can never forget"

WARNER BAXTER would like to forget—and devotedly wishes his pals would forget—that he ever went in for producing shows when he was an enterprising eight-year-old in Columbus, Ohio. He says he will never hear the last of it—can't live it down! A pal of his went in for eating flies as a gag to thrill his playmates. Warner decided that since it was such an attraction for the kids in the neighborhood he would cash in on the stunt. So in the back yard of his mother's home on High Street, young Baxter made a tent of gunny sacks. He announced that he was putting on a show—admission one penny. Warner took in the cash and doubled as a barker. For one penny his "actor" would consume a fly; for two pennies he would nonchalantly devour an angle worm. Business was brisk until his mother learned what he was doing. The show folded, but the "advertising" by word of mouth has come on down through the years.

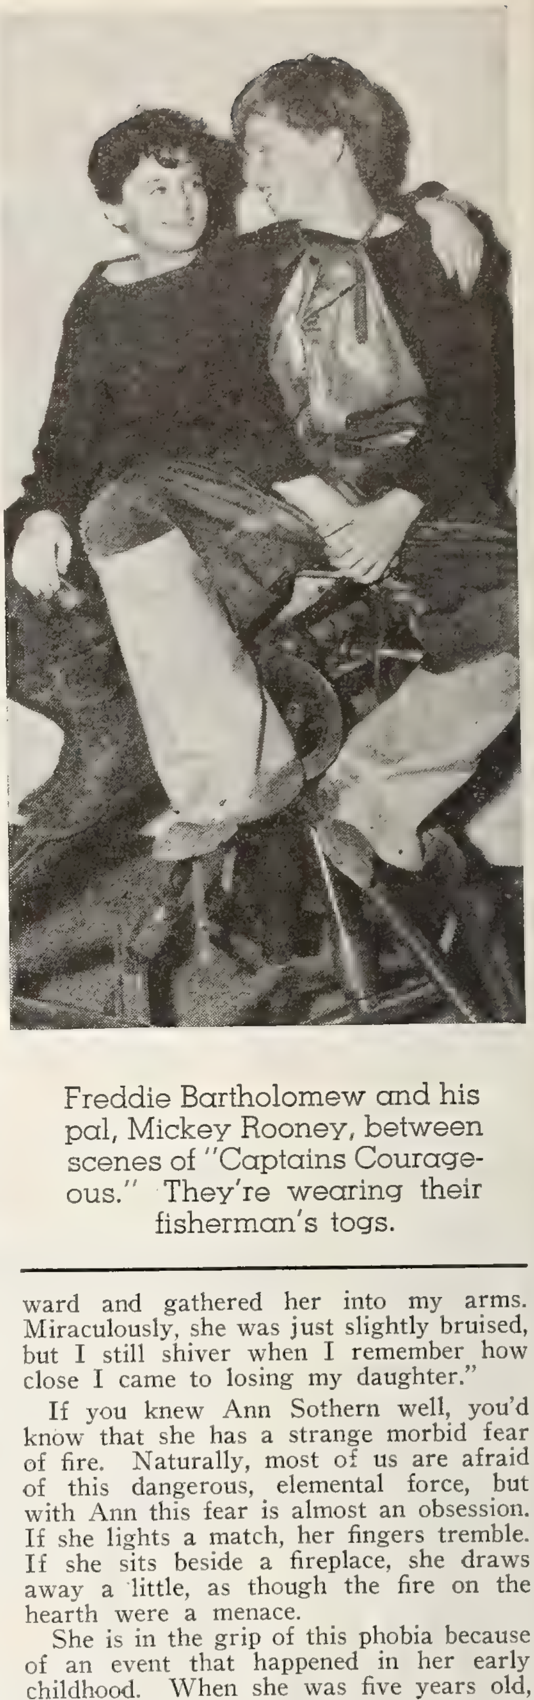
Janet Gaynor would like to forget how frightened she was when she performed on a trapeze for a scene in "Four Devils," a silent picture made years ago under the direction of the late Fred Murnau. She worked with Charles Morton, who was her leading man, at the top of a real circus tent and actually swung on the trapeze as she was supposed to do in her role of a circus acrobat. Suspended in the air between life and death, she felt chill horror grip her many times. It was a hazard any way one looked at it.

George Raft wants to forget the first picture he ever made in Hollywood. He played a very small role, a tough guy part, and following the preview he went home and actually packed his bags to beat it back to New York. He was that bad—as an actor. He doesn't even want to remember the name of the picture.

Gladys Swarthout would like to forget the time she appeared on the opening program of the San Diego Exposition. On a few hours' notice she was persuaded to sing over a radio hook-up following the dedication by President Roosevelt. She drove 130 miles through rain and had to walk half a mile from the exposition gate to the outdoor organ. The time was so limited that she could not rehearse with the organist. And five minutes before she was to sing, an attendant revealed that he had lost her copy of the music. She had to read the words over the organist's shoulder and the organ was so loud she could not hear her own voice.

"IF I could forget anything I chose, I would like to forget the earthquake in Los Angeles," Edward Arnold told me. "I can still see that scene as clearly as if it were happening right now. I remember my wife was getting dinner ready. The house shook. Suddenly the lights went out. In the semi-darkness I caught a glimpse of my small daughter, the littlest of my children, running toward the kitchen door. Directly in front of her, a chandelier attached to the ceiling suddenly tumbled down.

"Her life was at stake! I started to warn her, but before I could say anything, the fixture had crashed to the floor, grazing the back of her neck. I rushed forward and gathered her into my arms. Miraculously, she was just slightly bruised, but I still shiver when I remember how close I came to losing my daughter."



Freddie Bartholomew and his pal, Mickey Rooney, between scenes of "Captains Courageous." They're wearing their fisherman's togs.

If you knew Ann Sothern well, you'd know that she has a strange morbid fear of fire. Naturally, most of us are afraid of this dangerous, elemental force, but with Ann this fear is almost an obsession. If she lights a match, her fingers tremble. If she sits beside a fireplace, she draws away a little, as though the fire on the hearth were a menace.

She is in the grip of this phobia because of an event that happened in her early childhood. When she was five years old, she and her mother were visiting her grandmother in the Middle West. While Ann was playing in the kitchen, she found some matches and lit one against her shoe, as she had occasionally seen her mother do. But something went wrong! Her shoe caught fire! The flames spread, enveloping her! She screamed. Her mother came in, grabbed her, rolled her in a rug. She tried to keep the fire from Ann's face, but it had already left its marks on her body.

For a month Ann lay in bed with her arms propped up. A month of horrible, enforced rest.

There are still scars on Ann's body, scars that fortunately do not show in the pictures she makes. But they are a constant reminder to Ann Sothern of the thing she wants to forget.

There's a Mr. X in Sylvia's Life

period when the role of Juliet was an obsession and he was the willing, if awkward, Romeo emoting around Sylvia's kitchen while his bright-eyed cousin went into the lines of the historic heroine.

In the beginning, the four years difference in their ages made a wide span which was bridged as both grew older. She read the literature which interested the serious student and, while she had no official education and few contacts, she was a cultured person at sixteen because of her association with him and his work.

The fact that Sylvia Sidney became well known in the theatre at sixteen "without question turned her head," so her cousin says, but he adds quickly, "she arrived at early maturity and then got a true sense of values." He admits, too, that Sylvia's association with him and their complete interest in their work, to the exclusion of other activities, "spoiled her for young men" in that period of her life when young girls are usually intrigued with romance, college dances and parties.

That the efforts of these two toward successful futures were not in vain has been proven by the accomplishments of both. Not, however, that each has not had setbacks which might have defeated them if they had been of weaker stuff. There was the time when the young scientist's best friend, aside from Sylvia, died of the bite of a mad monkey before Mr. X had discovered a serum which could effect a cure. The loss left a mark on his life, but like his lovely cousin's experiences, it spurred him to such intensive research that he conquered the infection.

WHEN Sylvia went to Hollywood in 1928 with a successful record of stage roles behind her, she was so miscast and her possibilities so disregarded that she returned to Broadway embittered by her contact with the cinema world. She saw herself in one picture "Through Different Eyes," and became so terror-stricken with the screen figure of herself that she jumped her contract and took the first train out of California. She screened so badly that sometime later, when her mother was making purchases in a New York shop, another customer, hearing her name blurted out, "Oh, Miss Sidney, I saw you in your picture, but I think you look younger off the screen."

When Sylvia's mother was told she looked younger than the screen personality of her nineteen-year-old daughter, Sylvia thought it was time to say goodby to that sort of medium. But she went back later to a series of successes that have made her one of the most important of the Hollywood stars.

Not that she has completely forgotten the theatre.

"I had planned to take a stage engagement this year," she explained, "but the producers have such good things lined up for me this year, I couldn't stay away from pictures now."

She can submerge herself completely in a role, while she is working, and then dismiss it from her thoughts, so that two weeks after she has completed a picture, she doesn't remember it at all. Nor is she an inveterate movie-goer. She has had trouble with her eyes, as she says, and waits until there is a picture which par-

The sides of Kotex are cushioned in a special, soft, downy cotton to prevent chafing and irritation. Thus Wondersoft Kotex provides lasting comfort and freedom. But sides only are cushioned—the center surface is free to absorb.

2 CAN'T FAIL
The filler of Kotex is actually 5 TIMES more absorbent than cotton. A special "Equalizer" center guides moisture evenly the whole length of the pad. Gives "body" but not bulk—prevents twisting and roping.

3 CAN'T SHOW
The rounded ends of Kotex are flattened and tapered to provide absolute invisibility. Even the sheerest dress, the closest-fitting gown, reveals no tell-tale lines or wrinkles.

ticularly interests her before okaying it.

The first view she had of "Fury," in which she made such a success with Spencer Tracy, was at a showing in London, long after it had been seen by her American fans. There's an advantage in being able to dismiss a role from her mind when she is through with it, because she has a fear of becoming a screen type or of being afflicted with a screen mannerism, a hangover from one production to the next.

Her face is tiny with its tilted nose and wide mouth and her eyes are strange, mellow, keenly alive eyes of an unusual hazel with a sizeable brown spot in the right one. She's five feet three when she wears shoes with the highest heels she can buy. Her figure, off the screen, is slight and graceful, and she weighs 104 pounds. It looks even less than that in the trim, dark, tailored suits and plain shirts she wears away from Hollywood. When she's willing to discuss any matter she talks frankly but, when the subject is not to her liking, she is either silent or deftly turns the conversation into other channels.

Sylvia loves the New York where she first met success. She eagerly had anticipated a ten-day holiday in Manhattan when she returned from England. But a few hours after her arrival, her boss asked her if she would take the next plane to Hollywood. She wanted at least a few days in the East and definitely she would not plane back, she told him. So, she stayed four days and went by train.

SYLVIA is off flying—but definitely. She used to commute by air across the continent frequently but she had so many forced landings, she claims, that the only thing that would get her up into the clouds again would be the necessity to reach her mother in the quickest possible time.

"I flew to my own wedding and look what happened," Sylvia said with a rueful smile. The marital union of the star and Bennett Cerf, young New York publisher, was short-lived, ending after a brief trial when both discovered they couldn't make a go of it. The bridegroom maintained it was impossible for a man of his professional interests to remain successfully married to a Hollywood wife with a career.

The much-admired Miss Sidney is one star who ate her way to slimness. The cameras used to do mean things to her figure, as she recalls—always made her look heavier than she was.

"When I saw myself on the screen I was disgusted," she said. An opinion no one else shared with her. However, it took an impacted wisdom tooth to accomplish her present enviable proportions. The tooth was so troublesome it necessitated an operation in Hollywood and, when the wound refused to heal, she hurried to New York specialists. They agreed she was in bad condition and the prescribed treatment was one to strike terror to the heart of any movie beauty. She had to stop work for three months and her daily menu was one that read as though it were intended for an emaciated creature who just couldn't gain a single pound. During the three months Sylvia relaxed at the beach, she ate three heavy meals a day with potatoes and cream and desserts, to say nothing of large glasses of fruit juice between meals. When friends saw what she consumed, they protested vehemently.

"You can't eat like that, Sylvia. You've got to make a picture soon and you'll weigh a ton." Sylvia had her misgivings, but she continued on the daily orgy. The miracle happened—she ate and ate but her clothes continued to fit, and when her mother visited her as the vacation was drawing to a close, she exclaimed in amazement,

"Darling, you're much thinner!"

And indeed Sylvia appeared slimmer but the scales indicated that her weight hadn't dropped at all. What had happened was that the little flesh which had concentrated in a few places had been more evenly distributed and her figure photographs more attractively. Also, as she says, she felt like a million dollars, but she wouldn't recommend that regime to any other girl trying to slenderize. Not all of them have the stomach trouble which afflicted her.

The way that Sylvia Sidney has taken her life has been eminently satisfactory to her—no qualms about courses she has pursued and no regrets for the lesser things she has passed by. Her work is her all-absorbing interest and whatever else comes along must of necessity be a lesser attraction. She hasn't changed much since the early years when she and Mr. X mapped out their futures and gave all they had to the business of making dreams come true.

She still is intensely interested in his work, feels that if she were not an actress she would like to be a doctor. And Mr. X, happy in his chosen field and the fact that he was a principal factor in helping his cousin to fame, knows that if he couldn't be a scientist, he'd keep on trying anyway, because Sylvia's acting career is enough for two dreams that were shared.

Not To Be Ignored

plenty, if I flopped. He stuck right by me, gave me a free hand, said I could do anything I wanted—while I was getting the freeze on all sides and he was taking a lot in the way of criticism. Yeah, man, do I love him!

"Well, to make a long story practically unbearable, the studio was all for tossing me out on my ear in the nearest alley, and I was getting ready to agree. Speaking of mental hazards—one of the best is to keep right on doing something everybody says is wrong."

Then the make-up man joined my side; that helped a lot when you consider what make-up can do for a pan like this. He was very kind and encouraging—kept saying 'just be yourself.' And Norman would add, 'That's a lot of self.'

"This business I do—there's no halfway about it. Either it is too perfectly stinking awful, or it gets over. You can't just be there. You have to let down your hair and tear up the scenery. So—I did. That contract I had dreamed about seemed to fade into the distance and the train whistle got louder.

YOU know that drunk scene in 'Rhythm'? Well, it's my own; I wrote it. I feel tender about it, like a relative. I used to say the 'Who do you think you are anyhow'? line when I was but a girl (I'm twenty now—cross my heart). I played it in lots of night clubs, with variations—sometimes getting paid, sometimes not. It went into the scene without a syllable changed. Why, after all, at a time like that, should I get dignified or something?

"Then came the preview—came the dawn, came the millenium, came the Marines—it's all the same to me. Yeah, man, this is no time for false modesty. That was my moment and I loved it, I wouldn't kid you. The next day there were all the mysterious 'Theys' wreathed in smiles, saying, 'We are glad we were wrong for your sake—and ours.' And 'Will you please sign this five-year contract on the dotted line? Just make a mark if you can't write,' and 'What color do you want your dressing-room?' and 'Would you like to drive your car on the lot?' (me and Dietrich) and 'How will you have your eggs?'"

We met, the first time, over at Glenda Farrell's. Glenda's cousin and Martha's romance is Jerry Hopper; Jerry had the flu. He allowed as how he would like a cup of nice hot tea.

Martha shooed everybody out of the kitchen. "He's my Jerry and I want to make his tea. Poor darling!"

Enter Aunt Margaret to fill a hot water bottle for poor dear Jerry. "Heavens to Betsy!" shrieked Auntie, holding up the tea kettle. "It's full of tea!"

"Of course. Where else would you make tea?" spoke up Martha, calmly. "It was such a small package," she added, anxiously, "do you think it will be strong enough?" Just then the spoon Jerry was stirring with, melted.

As a cook, she's a grand comic. Not much else was revealed on that occasion, except a few illuminating sidelights on the romance.

"At first," Martha said, "we didn't get along together. I saw Jerry at different places and in the music department at Paramount, where he works, but he just sort of didn't pay any attention to me. Well, I'm not the sort of a girl to be ignored. Anything but that. I had to ask him to take me out, and he got shy and said, 'Well, when do you want to go out?' So I said 'tonight.' It was already tonight. He said, 'I didn't get paid yet.' 'That's all right,' I said, 'I got money.' So we went out."

We bumped into her again at a place called the Palomar—a kind of a night club highly favored by the younger generation.

Near us was a table of high-school sheiks and their gals. We had just about ordered our lemonade when a very worldly gent, about fifteen, zoomed over and asked Martha to dance. Seems he saw her in a picture and figured he'd like to dance with her. He didn't ask how she felt about it.

They danced—if you could call it dancing. The boy hunched up his shoulders, got a good grip and off they went, collegiate as all-get-out. Then it got to the fancy stuff—they threw wing-dings all over the place and looked as if they were continuously knocking each other out.

Martha came back, gasping, and at that moment—very good timing—another lad appeared. He was all of sixteen. After all, she danced with one of the party, didn't she? A girl couldn't play favorites.

The boys' girl friends sat there trying to look pleased about the whole thing. And Jerry, back at home base holding onto his dignity, not without a struggle, didn't get a dance all evening. Martha danced with the whole high school. She had a grand time. They asked her to join their basketball team. Said she'd consider it.

SHE loves to go out and have fun. An evening at home is her idea of a total loss. Really, it's rather refreshing after this recent cult of young lady actresses who love nothing better than an evening among their "book."

Martha got home at five A. M. the day she made her big scene in "Rhythm"—the scene which was to determine the fate of her picture career. She went to the studio at six—and done all right, as they say at Harvard. Heaven knows what would have happened had she gone to bed at ten P. M. Usually when an actress says, " I have a big scene to play tomorrow," you cross yourself and walk away on tip-toe.

She was on the stage at the age of three, that must account for the hours she keeps. Her parents were in vaudeville, and so was Martha for some years. She has performed in three plays and countless night clubs, including one (now closed) called the Southern Surf, referred to by Martha as the Scum and Scurf. Seems the entertainers seldom got paid.

She happened to mention it during lunch at the Paramount commissary one day. That's about all she had time to mention, because the table might as well have had a STOP sign on it. There arrived a bevy of pretty little blonde things from a musical number who fell upon Martha with glad cries. It seems they were in the "line" of a New York night club where Martha was the chief performer. When things got too bad, Martha moved in and bunked with them and it was all very cozy with a waiting list for the bath tub from here to there.

The bevy was scattered by an extra woman selling Christmas cards, followed by the handsome leading man who demanded how come Martha took advantage of his absence over the week-end to get engaged. (It was in the morning papers.) And if so, where was her ring? "I'll get it, don't push me," Martha advised, winding up her face and throwing the ring at him—a very good trick if you can do it, but one that takes talent.

Martha Raye was born in Butte, Montana, because her parents happened to be playing vaudeville there at the time. Though she was only a kid, she appeared in a vaudeville drama with her parents, and was a serious actress until the age of fourteen. At fourteen, she saw Mary Wigman dance, and it changed her whole life.

FASCINATED with admiration, Martha decided this was her real métier—she would be an exponent of the modern dance. She went to Harold Kreutzberg, foremost dancer of the Wigman school, and begged him to take her as a student. He agreed, if she would study with him for a year at the minimum. A year—goodness gracious, that was nothing. She would study forever. She was, even at that tender age, passionately moved by modern symphonic music.

Well, it appears that young Martha neglected to let her good parents in on this new ambition, and when she began practising the angular, abrupt patterns of the modern school before her mirror, Mr. and Mrs. Pete Reed, her parents, were baffled, to put it mildly. Then they were amused in a nice way, but pretty soon their control gave out and they roared.

"I just didn't have the face or the figure to go with it," Martha admits sadly, with a deep sigh. And that was how she discovered she was a comedienne.

It didn't take long for the fans to fall for little Deanna Durbin whose golden voice is amazing for a fourteen-year-old. She has loads of charm and beauty to boot.

The passion for music stayed with her, and it is no pose, as is the case with some of our leading stars—the girl has a collection of modern classical records that really is something. Martha goes on worshipping her own gods, willy-nilly. It is pretty much in contrast to the "yeah, man" girl who is the best whooper-upper in many a long dreary day. Heaven knows, she wouldn't care to have anyone get the idea she's a highbrow! Not that Martha is apologetic for loving good music—she just figures nobody will believe it anyway.

Aside from that, she goes to Italian red-ink joints for dinner and floors the waiters by speaking Italian. Same thing happens in Olvera Street with the Mexicans. In any group, she moves right in without wasting time on needless formalities. She calls Glenda's dignified, white-haired Aunt Margaret "Margie," and Aunt Margaret loves it. Glenda's dad, known as "Unk Nunkie," was having a bout with lumbago, but Martha told him he was sex-starved. He perked right up and began looking around.

Martha is allergic to cats and begins sneezing right away if she sits in a chair after one. (She sneezes often in Hollywood.) She is an even combination of Irish and Jewish, is a naïve child in many respects, and she did not arrive in town with a contract under her belt. A few performances in a local night club fixed that. She is never sorry for herself—can have the world's worst cold and keep right on clowning.

She has a white car and a colored maid named Lulu—two of her life's ambitions lately realized. (Lulu taught her the truckin' step.) She has been engaged three times—but never in love before. And she can't cook—but who cares?

Between You 'n' Me

To be frank, we fans were thoroughly disgusted with Dick's "Jerome Bonaparte," we despise mustaches, we abhor domestic complexes in our romantic cinema heroes, particularly crooners. We prefer sweet, refined little Ruby any time to the buxom, blasé Joanie as Dick's real sweetheart. We like Joan as the "Gold Digger" or "Three Men on a Horse" heroines, but please leave the shy violet dramatics to adorable Keeler.—Mrs. E. Franzeen, Ursa, Ill.

Honorable Mention

Three Cheers for the Raye Gal

Oh, boy, what a star! Personality, ability, talent, they all spell just plain Martha Raye. I saw both "Rhythm on the Range," and "The Big Broadcast." After seeing her steal both shows, I'm convinced that she is one of the biggest finds of the year and absolutely the best commedienne of any year. Hold on to her, Hollywood, you've got something there.—Catherine Campbell, Evansville, Indiana.

Them's Fighting Words

Isn't it about time to call it quits for the Rogers-Astaire pictures? You find the same characters, the sameness in Miss Rogers' clothes, almost the same plot in every picture and the same sing-songish songs. "Roberta" wasn't bad because it had lively Irene Dunne in it, but to star Rogers and Astaire is a great mistake. Neither of them has a good voice, and Ginger goes through the same "hand movements" in all her dances, while Mr. Astaire can't compare with Charles Collins in grace, good looks, poise or dancing.

Please team Charles Collins and Jessie Matthews, Mr. Movie Producers.—Jane Brennan, Bloomfield, N. J.

Taylor Looks "Chopped Off"

The supposed idol of the hour is the one and only Robert Taylor, but if Taylor has set the world afire—I say, give me vanilla.

He has looks, if you like his type. His build is nothing to write home about because he looks "chopped off," and as for acting, anyone can do what he does. All that his roles call for is a handsome face. —Marianne Wood, Blackstone, Va.

What's Happened to Shirley?

After seeing "Dimples," my child disappointedly said, "Momie, that wasn't such a good Shirley Temple movie, was it? There were so many big people talking, and no ponies, or ducks, or dolls, or anything. She just danced and sang, and didn't play at all."

"Dimples" is an adult story, with adult characters and adult lines. Children understand little of the plot, and miss the usual childish delights. Imagine a Temple picture without a single animal, doll, toy or childish joke, with more tears than smiles!

Some of my little girl's happiest memories are the pony-in-bed scene, and Shirley's innocent "Oh, my goo'ness" of "Curly Top"; the birthday party, and apple-eating scenes with Lincoln in "The Littlest Rebel"; the live dolls and happy night with the Italian family in "Poor Little Rich Girl."

Please give Shirley back to the children. She belongs to them, and, after all, grown-ups are children at heart.—Mrs. Clifford Holand, Forest Hills, N. Y.

Why Ballyhoo Stars' Private Lives?

I do honestly just adore Modern Screen and wouldn't miss one issue of it for worlds—especially your little corner which follows through the whole magazine, depicting your originality, impartiality and humor.

There is one question which bothers me tremendously. Why is it that publicity agents play up so noisily the various changes that take place, from time to time, in a star's private life? After all, our interest in them is really impersonal—wholly focused on their ability to act, their beauty and poise on the screen. Why aren't they entitled to indulge in their own individual whims of character?

I, for one, think Jean Harlow is a marvellous actress, despite the fact that she prefers to live in a homey, comfortable house more adapted to her honey-colored locks rather than a huge white mansion suitable to her platinum crown. She is a clever actress, nevertheless. If Clark Gable dislikes to don his soup and fish and dashes impulsively to the old fishing hole, he is still the perfect screen lover.—Aileen Conlon, Ontario, Canada.

Bits From Your Letters

Although I am far away in Tasmania, I hear lots of talk about Robert Taylor. Every girl is just mad about him, and wouldn't mind if he played in every talkie. We never tire of seeing his handsome face. I think it's a shame he can't take a trip to our beautiful land.—Margaret Kinsella, Ulverstone, Tasmania. I wish Errol Flynn would relax and quit threatening to leave for Borneo—or else leave for Borneo.—D. H. Chapman, Los Angeles, Calif. Self-respecting persons have always resented portrayals on the screen of cads striking women. There's nothing very brave or he-mannish about slapping down someone who is defenseless. Even such a grand picture as "The General Died at Dawn" put Gary Cooper in the embarrassing situation of hitting a girl. It cheapened the character—and weakened him.—Phil Marden. Something should be done about putting Robert Taylor into a role such as was given him in "The Gorgeous Hussy." We've been worried and upset ever since. Also, putting so much history into the movies, just to satisfy complaints made by school teachers and old maids, is getting us down. It's getting so a girl can't even drown herself in a movie without being reminded of her history quiz the next day.—Lillian Merritt, Cincinnati, Ohio. Give me stars like Myrna Loy and Merle Oberon. There are so many blondes with large, dreamy grey eyes that it's quite a relief to see stars with a charm that doesn't only come from looks, but from a vague mysteriousness that seems to hold Myrna and Merle in its grip. I like naturalness.—Diana Richardson, Ontario, Canada.

The organization was large and stifling, cramped his style, was inclined to dictate. Since that time he has joined Grand National, which allows him to name his own terms. Cagney is married to Frances Vernon. He is five feet nine inches tall, weighs 155 pounds, has flaming red hair, freckles in the summer, and alert brown eyes. His current picture is "Great Guy."

JEAN ARTHUR (First printing; total number of requests. 225.) They hid Jean Arthur's light under an apple pie, back in those early days of slapstick comedy. That it was extravagant to waste such beauty had not occurred to some director, with a genius for miscasting. So the girl who had posed as a model for Howard Chandler Christy, languished year after year as the heroine of two-reel comedies and inconsequential Westerns. But the flame of Jean Arthur's ambition was not easily dimmed. To escape from the roles for which she had been typed, she decided to free lance, moved from one small independent company to the other, playing in anything and everything except Westerns and two-reel comedies. She broke the jinx. Paramount signed her, gave her big roles in productions such as "The Sins of the Fathers" with Emil Jannings and "The Canary Murder Case." Still Jean did not feel that her star had reached its ascendant. Obeying the axiom that movie stars are made not in Hollywood, but on Broadway, she left pictures. Once more Jean had made the correct choice. Broadway casting directors showed more discretion than had Hollywood. She was given one fine dramatic role after the other . . . proving that if she was to be typed at all, it was as a versatile performer equally at home in poignant drama and farcical comedy. With beauty alone, Jean might still be a model . . . with ambition alone she might still be a slapstick queen . . . but she had brains as well . . . and now, crowning her tactical efforts with success, Columbia awarded her a contract, made her a star. Her work in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town" has done the rest. has elevated her to a position of equal footing with such glamorous stars as Claudette Colbert and Carole Lombard. Jean Arthur is a New York girl. She was born October 17, 1908. She's of Norwegian descent, and as you would expect, has very blonde hair and eyes as blue as the fjords. She's slightly built, 5 feet 3 inches tall, and weighs only 110 pounds. Scheduled for her next picture is "History Is Made at Night."

GENE AUTRY (Last printed May 6, 1936. Total number of requests since then 321.) Why "Singing Cowboy" Autry is by far the most popular of the Western stars is soon told. It has to do with Gene's genuineness . . . nothing synthetic about him . . . the personality isn't a mask which he removes as soon as the camera stops turning . . . he's neither a singer taught to ride badly nor a rider taught to sing badly. As a matter of fact, Gene would be hard put to tell you which of his two prime talents comes more naturally to him. Born, Sept. 29, 1907, in Tioga, Texas, heart of the cattle country, he rode before he walked. At the age of twelve he was bulldogging steers in the Achilles, Oklahoma, rodeo. Meanwhile singing in the choir of his grand-daddy's Baptist church had laid the foundations for a voice that is today more popular than Bing Crosby's. A restlessness bred of the open range prompted Gene to leave home at fourteen to seek his own fortune. For a year he traveled with a medicine show, singing and playing that steel guitar of his. Then at the end of the year, Gene began to feel that he was old enough to

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

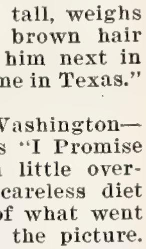
The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

take a more serious view of life. So he settled down, this fifteen-year-old, and became telegraph operator in the railway station of one of Oklahoma's most desolate cattle towns. He took the work seriously, began to think of singing as a hobby . . . a bit frivolous at that. But a handsome offer from a Tulsa radio station soon cured the young sobersides of his telegraphic aspirations. From then on, Gene's story was not that of the struggling young artist, but rather of the successful entertainer who could choose his employment at his own terms. After several years in vaudeville and radio, during which he had been featured on such programs as the Alka-Seltzer Barn Dance, he was assigned to a Ken Maynard Western. His very first picture clicked in a big way, and he was immediately given star billing. Gene likes to give much of the credit to his horse, Champ, who is probably the best dressed horse in pictures. The total cost of his trappings runs well over the three thousand dollar mark. However, Gene can afford to be generous. He has a very remunerative hobby. He writes his own songs . . . words, music, 'n' everything, and the sales run up into the millions. Gene is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 165 pounds, and has reddish brown hair and blue eyes. You will see him next in "Old Corral" and "Roundup Time in Texas."

MRS. D. B. BARNES, Seattle, Washington—Chester Morris' next picture is "I Promise to Pay." If Chester looks a little overstuffed, don't blame it to a careless diet at home. It's all on account of what went on in filming one sequence of the picture. The poor fellow had to eat nine full-sized meals before the cameras in making a cafe scene! Swell for a starving man but not such fun for a well-fed one like Chet.



TYRONE POWER (First printing; total number of requests, 105.) A month ago, before the release of "Lloyds of London," you didn't know who he was. Two years ago a Hollywood casting office refused him a seven-dollar-a-day extra job. And yet this charming boy, with the quizzical dark eyes, is an experienced trouper, a descendant of a long line of actors, and made his stage debut at the age of eight. Strictly speaking, Tyrone was not a stage child, in the sense of being a stepchild. He had a substantial home in Cincinnati, his birthplace, and as much education as he wanted. He didn't want college, preferring instead to join with his father in Fritz Leiber's Shakespearean company. A year or so later, after Tyrone senior's death, he joined Don Ameche in Chicago radio programs. But Broadway is the Mecca of all young thespians, and Tyrone couldn't resist its magnetism for long. A three months siege at five dollars a week was relieved by an understudy role in a Katharine Cornell production. Tyrone remained under the aegis of Miss Cornell's group for two more productions, and it was his work in "St. Joan" which brought him to the attention of 20th Century-Fox. If you saw "Girls' Dormitory," you will remember him as Simone Simon's cousin. He next appeared as the fickle young count who breaks Loretta Young's heart in "Ladies in Love." And then, of course, "Lloyds of London," the turning point of his career. To date, he has been too busy getting to the top of the heap to take time out for love. So that gives all you girls an equal chance. His next picture is "Love Is News."

ANNE SHIRLEY (Last printed July, 1935. Total number of requests since then, 201.) Anne Shirley is the exception proving the rule that good child actors make poor adult actors. Professional life commenced at the very immature age of fourteen months—as a department store model, posing in swanky baby clothes. At the age of three, pretty little Dawn O'Day (the original moniker) had made her first picture, "The Miracle Child." Followed years when the baby bread winner and her mother felt the pinch of hardship. The family budget stalled at ten dollars a week . . . hardly an inspirational wage for a struggling artist with dependents. Despite the slender finances, Dawn managed to attend both professional school and regular school. What's more she graduated from high in 1933. RKO-Radio provided her with her first important ingenue role in "Finishing School." And then came the long deferred payment for the weary years of struggle . . . the lead in "Anne of Green Gables." The three-year-old star had become the sixteen-year-old star. It was at this time that the legal death of Dawn O'Day took place, and Anne Shirley was born . . . the latter, by the way, being the name of the character she had played in the "Green Gables" production. To round out the story of youth and beauty, we must have love. And Anne's romance with Owen Davis, Jr., fills the bill. Anne is 5 feet 2 inches tall, weighs 100 pounds, has arresting hazel eyes and gorgeous titian colored hair. Her hobby, you might say, is to watch over the famous collection of dolls given her by stars with whom she worked as a child. Her latest film is "Make Way for a Lady" with Herbert Marshall.

Loy and Asta, Mr. P. bobs up in the final scene with the answer. The co-stars are at their comic best, playing delightfully funny scenes as though they enjoyed them to the hilt. Notable in the cast are Jimmy Stewart, Joseph Calleia, Jessie Ralph, Elissa Landi, Teddy Hart and Sam Levene.

This marks the sixth celluloid matrimonial venture of Myrna Loy and Bill Powell. Myrna and Bill were first wedded in "Manhattan Melodrama," but nobody cared particularly until "The Thin Man" came along. The resultant enthusiastic clamor is the reason for this film. It's directed by Woody Van Dyke again . . . Having been married to too many handsome men to count on one hand in reel life, Myrna put off the real thing until a few months ago. Arthur Hornblow, Jr., producer of pictures at Paramount, is new boss. And he claims Myrna is really like her Nora in the "Thin Man" series. What's more, Myrna admits trying to be like her off-screen, too . . . Elissa Landi, Myrna and all the women on this picture had no time to waste on talk, bridge or tea between shots. They were busily at work on little things—crocheting, knitting and sewing a complete layette. After some days of aggravating silence, they finally broke down and admitted the new outfit was intended for Myrna's personal maid Theresa, who is expecting a baby in the near future . . . Following the completion of this picture, Bill Powell left for a rendezvous with his pals, Ronald Colman and Dick Barthelmess. He met them some 150 miles out in the Pacific where they were fishing off the Barthelmess yacht. A plane dropped their new guest at the door . . . Whether Elissa Landi is actually Mrs. Nino Martini these days is keeping Hollywood guessing. The two are constantly together, and the dark-eyed singer was a frequent visitor to the set.

★★★ That Girl From Paris
(RKO-Radio)

Lily Pons' new picture is worth seeing just to hear—if you get what we mean. As a comedienne the diminutive star comes through in a big way, though responsibility for most of the laughs rests on the ample shoulders of Jack Oakie. Gene Raymond provides the heart interest and shares blonde honors with Lucille Ball, who is comely and capable in a minor role. Frank Jenks provides some excellent comedy, while Mischa Auer swipes every scene, as usual, when he comes within camera range. The story is a rather feeble one designed to get the most out of the able comedians and utilize Lily Pons' pert attractiveness and golden voice to best advantage. That the picture falls short of the mark in several instances isn't to be wondered at with such requirements. The plot has something to do with Lily leaving her wealthy groom flat at the altar and falling for Gene Raymond, a penniless orchestra leader. She decides to follow him to America and smuggles her way on board the ship where he and his orchestra, composed of Oakie, Jenks and Auer have a job. Familiarizing yourself with "That Girl From Paris" won't be time lost.

Chief fun-maker was Lily Pons herself. Everyone called her "Snooky." She had determined to learn ten more words of English every day from the people with whom she was working, but it soon turned out that everyone on the set was learning French from her instead. Appearing in a small role in this one is Lily's mother. She speaks no English, so she just went in front of the camera as part of the scenery and for the thrill of being a movie actress. Andre Kostelanetz, to whom it is rumored Miss Pons is married, had charge of all the recordings on the picture in which the star sang. And if you don't think that was a job, consider how Mr. K. managed this between Monday and Wednesday broadcasts for the Chesterfield Hour in New York City. He spent every week-end in Hollywood, and flew back and forth gaily between his various jobs. Kostelanetz had a small piano made to order for her birthday. It can fit into any nook or corner of her dressing-room or studio set. . . . Jack Oakie is soon to become a proud father. Venita Varden, Mrs. Oakie off-screen, has been resorting at Palm Springs and Jack was busily flying between Paramount and the desert spa to his wife . . . That comedy dance of Lucille Ball's was anything but funny to her. She was laid up in bed for three days after the afternoon spent shooting the scene—because she really took everyone of those tumbles. Lucille is the girl who used to look at you from those cigarette ads. She landed the job of posing for the manufacturer after he had spotted her in the back row of Ziegfeld's "Rio Rita." Born in Montana in 1911, Lucille went to New York determined to be a great dramatic actress, and spent two years modelling clothes before she even landed her first job. After the ad modelling, though, she was contacted by a studio for a screen test, and made good.

★★★ Three Smart Girls
(Universal)

This picture won't take you by surprise as it did the Hollywood preview audience, since by this time you've no doubt heard about Deanna Durbin. A Los Angeles school-girl, Deanna makes so promising a cinema debut here that she is undoubtedly slated for stardom in short order. Besides this attraction, there is good work by other members of the cast, including Bin-

ARE YOU A
"POWDER SWITCHER"?

Switching face powders may do you an injustice—Make you look years older than you really are!

How to find your most becoming face powder

By Lady Esther

Do you try one face powder this month and another the next? Do you choose face powder because this girl or that uses it? What may look good on one girl may look bad on another.

Hit-or-miss methods of selecting your face powder, or your shade of face powder, put you at a great disadvantage. It means you have one complexion one day and another the next. It calls attention to your make-up all the time.

If the shade you happen to choose is the wrong one, it makes you look years older than you really are. What you want, first of all, is the right kind of face powder. Secondly, the right shade.

No. 1. The Right Kind of Face Powder

A face powder must be soft. It must be smooth—absolutely smooth. Only a smooth powder will go on evenly and blend perfectly.

Only a smooth powder will act as a blotter on the skin. It is the blotter-like qualities of face powder that absorb excessive oil and perspiration and prevent shine.

Lady Esther Face Powder is soft—extremely soft and smooth. It contains no rough or sharp particles whatever. This you can prove by my famous "bite test."

Because it is so smooth, Lady Esther Face Powder goes on evenly and blends perfectly. It also acts as a blotter on the skin. It absorbs the excessive oil and perspiration that causes that hated shine.

No. 2. The Right Shade

First, the right powder—then the right shade!

There is only one way to tell which is your most becoming shade and that is to try on all five basic shades. You must not assume that because you are a blonde or a brunette or a redhead that you must use a certain shade. Any artist or make-up expert will tell you that.

You may be a blonde and yet have a very dark or olive skin; or a brunette and have a very light skin; or vice versa.

What you want to do is NOT match your skin, but improve your appearance. You want, NOT a matching shade, but a flattering shade.

I Say "Try," not "Buy"

In my five shades I provide the most becoming one for you. What it is neither I, nor anyone else, can tell you in advance. You must try on all five shades.

But I don't ask you to go into a store and buy all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder. No, indeed! I say: "Here, take all the five shades of my face powder and try them all on! Let your own eyes tell you which is your most becoming shade."

Today!

Decide today to make this telling face powder test. Mail the coupon below and by return mail you'll receive all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder. Try on all five shades.

Notice that one shade will instantly declare itself the one for you. Notice, too, how smooth my face powder is, how long it stays on and how well it prevents shine. One test will tell you volumes!

Sergeant's DOG MEDICINES

nie Barnes, Alice Brady, Nan Grey, Barbara Read, Mischa Auer, and Ray Milland. The dialogue is exceptionally bright and the competent direction and acting has turned it into a screen-play that holds your unswerving interest. Determined that their mother and father shall not be divorced, the three sisters—Deanna, Nan Grey and Barbara Read—set out to thwart the fortune-hunting female who is after their father's heart and pocketbook. You will hardly find it in your heart, however, to blame Pater Charles Winninger when you see Binnie Barnes, the female under question, all done up in her new blonde hair. But with three such determined daughters, Mr. W. is finally persuaded to give up any notions he might have been entertaining. There are a couple of fresh young romances tucked in, and plenty of laughs, pathos and suspense for good measure.

Preview Postscript

The most important "prop" on this set was the portable dressing-room which had been turned into a schoolroom for the use of the three young girls in this picture, Deanna Durbin, Barbara Read and Nan Grey. Much to their disgust, they found that the California school laws are as strict with movie actresses as with any other girls under eighteen years of age . . . Deanna Durbin is really a local product, having lived in Los Angeles from her first year. However, she was born in Winnipeg, Canada, fourteen years ago. Deanna can never complain about her thirteenth year being an unlucky one. For in this period of life she became both a movie star and a prima donna on a national coast-to-coast hook-up and is now being considered for a Metropolitan debut. But you'd never think that all these things had happened to Deanna to look at her. She's quite unimpressed with herself—and hasn't even seen what she looks like on the screen. The studio didn't want her to see the "rushes," being afraid she might catch on how good she was. . . . Nan Grey simply hates movies, but loves working in them. This arises from the fact that her father is a motion picture projectionist back in Dallas, Texas, and Nan has been brought up on movies. Two years ago, when she was fourteen, Nan and her mother took a trip to the Coast to get away from pictures—and ended up by signing a contract for Nan. An agent had seen the girl while shopping and made arrangements for a screen test. She had four offers from different studios the next week . . . Barbara Read was under contract at Columbia, but sat around waiting for something to happen. When nothing did after six months, she inquired about the reason. More experience, she was told, that's what's needed. Barbara marched out, with the remark, "Is that all?" Having friends living in Laguna Beach, some eighty miles away from Hollywood, she decided to visit them and get experience in the famous Little Theatre at Laguna. She got about ten years' acting experience in one year—playing in twenty-four different sketches and plays in that time. Fredric March brought Barbara to the attention of an actor's agent after admiring her performance while on a visit to Laguna.

★★★ Gold Diggers of 1937

(Warners)

The big news here is that they've discarded the ancient plot about the little chorus girl who gets her chance on the opening night of the big show after the leading lady gathers up her sequins and walks out of the part. This time things are concerned with a life insurance agency whose president is full of progress and epigrams. Dick Powell, the company's worst salesman, meets Joan Blondell and Glenda Farrell at a convention—the gals are stranded chorus girls —and through them he signs an aging producer to a million-dollar policy. The producer's conniving assistants (Osgood Perkins and Charles D. Smith) hope to cash in when the old boy dies, so it becomes Mr. Powell's job to keep him hale and hearty. Anyway, there's a legitimate excuse for the customary big show and the usual extravagant and not so novel Busby Berkeley numbers. Dick Powell sings several pleasing songs. Glenda Farrell steals the female comedy honors, and in the men's department the laurel leaves go to Victor Moore, who makes the aged producer a very funny guy. There is first-rate tap dancing by Lee Dixon, and a fine satiric bit by William Davidson as head of the insurance company.

Preview Postscript

Dick Powell had to keep his hands in his pockets for three days on this picture. The reason being that one thumb was all bandaged up due to his enthusiasm for amateur photography. While splicing film he cut the finger severely, then forgot to do anything about it except wind a handkerchief around it for a few hours. Blood-poisoning nearly got Mrs. Powell's new husband on that one . . . Work on this picture marked the beginning of Joan's sixth year for the Brothers Warner. She was rewarded with a really elegant portable dressing-room, furnished with the last gasp in chromium and ivory radios, a gift from Dick, so she can listen to his broadcast while she's at the studio . . . Glenda Farrell's still going very steadily with Drew Eberson, but vaguer than ever about any matrimonial plans . . . Lee Dixon's practice room was known as "Dixon's Nudist Colony." The dancer flatly refused to practice strenuously with any clothes on. So a special practice hall had to be assigned the new dancing star and while practicing with the chorus he had no less than four electric fans going for his exclusive use every minute. Dixon also holds the record for consumption of food on the lot —he ate eight meals a day, and snacks in between.

★★ Great Guy

(Grand National)

There's much of the old Cagney wallop to this first picture he has made under the Grand National banner. Picking the story himself, Jimmy wisely followed the type of thing which has endeared him to his public. As Chief Deputy of the Department of Weights and Measures, James has a chance to wade right into all sorts of skullduggery. He mixes with a new racket, food dealers who are chiseling their customers by an elaborate system of phoney weights.

As Johnny Cave, ex-puglilist, he is deputized to get the higher-ups in control of the racket. Janet Henry (Mae Clarke), his girl-friend, who is trying to get him to save enough money for them to marry on, is secretary to one of the city's leading citizens. It doesn't take much film footage for Cagney to suspect Mae's boss of monkey-business in the food racket. Mae is indignant, pointing out that Canning for years has been one of the city's greatest philanthropists. When Cagney faces Canning down, the fun begins and he practically loses Mae and his own hide in the excitement.

It was a smart move to pick such an unusal racket for the plot background because it sustains your interest through some rather elderly wisecracks and a few trite situations.

Cagney is swell and Mae Clarke plays up to him expertly. P. S. She doesn't get socked once! The supporting cast is well chosen. So all in all, it's a welcome return to the screen for Jimmy although not a spectacular one.

★ Crack-Up

(20th Century-Fox)

Loaded to the hilt with intrigue, airplanes and international spies, this film will appeal to lovers of weird melodrama who aren't too particular about plots and plausibility. Its main asset is a fine portrayal by Peter Lorre in another of his horror roles. By day Mr. L. is a simple soul who wanders about a metropolitan airport apparently doing nothing but furtively blowing on a small tin horn. He is regarded as a harmless half-wit by the boys around the hangars, but in his own circle he is "The Chief," head of a spy ring. "The Chief" hopes to lay hands on the secret plans for a new type of transport plane—a set of plans considered highly desirable by an un-named foreign nation. His progress in obtaining the papers will not be related here, but it may give you a clue or two to know that the rest of the cast includes a crooked aviator (Brian Donlevy), his young co-pilot (Thomas Beck), the plane's inventor (Ralph Morgan), and the sweet young thing (Helen Wood), who loves the honest young co-pilot. It's Peter Lorre's picture; the rest of the players have little chance to demonstrate their wares.

I CAN HARDLY BELIEVE IT'S ME
MISS GRAY ... YOUR EYES, WELL THEY DISTURB ME ... YOU'RE FIRED!

(TO HERSELF) WENDY'S THE DARLING!

WINX 3-Way Blend

Colors either blend or clash. In make-up, this means "naturalness" or that harsh "made-up" look. To eliminate any appearance of hardness particularly around the eyes, WINX has made its colors to blend 3 ways. 1. With complexion. 2. With eyes. 3. With each other. For example, WINX Blue Mascara blends perfectly with WINX Blue Eye Shadow or Eyebrow Pencil. Likewise, its tonal values are so balanced as to make it complementary to all other WINX colors. Thus, WINX gives you the secret of "natural" eye make-up.

IT'S amazing the way WINX mascara transforms the appearance of eyes. One moment—just attractive eyes. The next—an exotic, glamourous glance that stirs the emotions—the glance that men adore . . . and women envy. WINX truly glorifies the eyes. Makes lashes seem long, silky and shadowy as dusk. Keeps them soft, too. So try this harmless mascara today. In three balanced shades (Blue . Black . Brown) and in three convenient forms (Cake . Liquid Creamy). On sale at department, drug and 5 and 10 cent stores.

★ The Great O'Malley
(Warners)

Pat O'Brien again dons uniform and goes through his usual paces when thus outfitted. We've come to the conclusion that Pat's style is definitely cramped the minute he dons any kind of uniform, since he's always straining to live up to something or other and forgetting to be human. In this case he's living up to the ideals of the police department and making himself quite obnoxious. Duty is the rule by which he measures his life and for the next 15,000 feet of film, you're led to believe that this cop has no heart at all. But being movie-wise, you know that he'll break down before the final reel, so Ann Sheridan's coming into the picture is no surprise. Ann is a schoolmarm—and a warm-hearted one. Before she gets through with Pat she has him attending school-picnics and loving all the little children as much as the potato salad. Sybil Jason also helps with the break-down, being a little crippled girl, whose mother takes in laundry and whose daddy has been sent to jail by our Mr. O'Brien. Well, maybe we're short on heart ourselves, but this whole set-up left us cold.

★★ Banjo on My Knee
(20th Century-Fox)

Life on the shantyboats, along the lower Mississippi, is taken apart and put together again with such humor in this one that the result is an entertaining film with more than its share of fun. Co-starring Joel McCrea and Barbara Stanwyck, it gives both of them ample opportunity to display their special talents, even going so far as to allow Miss Stanwyck a song-and-dance number. When Barbara, a land girl, marries Joel, a river boy, there's an ominous feeling in the air that the thing won't go. Among the river characters who hope it will last are Buddy Ebsen, a droll sort of river rat, and Walter Brennan, Joel's father, who is anxious to become a grandfather. On the other side are Katherine De Mille, who would like Joel for herself, and Walter Catlett, a city slicker who's trying to lure Barbara to New Orleans. Sprightly dialogue and catchy music serve to make "Banjo on My Knee" worthy of your attention. Good songs are "Where the Lazy River Goes By" and "There's Something in the Air." There is also a swell rendition of "St. Louis Blues" by the Hall Johnson Choir. Walter Brennan steals the picture with a comedy character role which equals his Swan in "Come and Get It." Joel McCrea is completely believable as the river lad, and Barbara Stanwyck's work will add to her recently increasing popularity. Buddy Ebsen works in some nice comedy and a few fancy tap numbers, and there is some excellent singing by Tony Martin. On the whole, an enjoyable picture.

★★ God's Country and the Woman (Warners)

Warner Brothers have done themselves proud on this Technicolor picture. The story, with the big timber country of northern Washington as its setting, is admirably suited to the color medium. The vivid colors of northern streams, skies and vegetation blend well with the intense tones to which the color camera is still addicted. Though definite progress is being made with color photography, as proved by some scenic shots of breath-taking beauty in this film, there is still room for improvement in the photographing of characters, since harsh skin tones make one so "color conscious" that story, action and characterization assume secondary importance. The plot here has to do with a flippant young man, George Brent, who goes North to work in a lumber camp which he owns. Not because he wants to, but because his brother, Robert Barrat, thinks this the last chance to make a man of him—George having spent all his time and most of his fortune on wine, women and singing for the past few years. Out where men are men and women are, too, as George points out on their introduction, he meets Beverly Roberts. Beverly runs a rival camp, and has lumber on her brain to the exclusion of all romance including heart-breaker Brent. The outdoors, however, in the next eight reels makes a man out of George and a woman out of Beverly, so everybody's happy. Good support is given the leading characters by Alan Hale, a warm-hearted lumberjack, Barton MacLane, the meanie who stirs up all the trouble, and Vic Potel among others. Comedy is nicely handled by El Brendel, Roscoe Ates and Billy Bevan.

★★★ Stowaway

(20th Century-Fox)

If you've thought Shirley Temple was slipping, you should see this and find out how wrong you can be. For she comes back in what is undoubtedly her most entertaining picture to date. This time you can enjoy not only a good story, but every minute of Shirley. The little gal is an orphan, and when she accidentally stows away on board a liner travelling the China Seas, the complications come thick and fast. One of them is that Robert Young, a millionaire playboy, wants to adopt her. But it seems that without a wife a man can't do things like this. So he convinces Alice Faye that she should marry him and obtain a divorce when the boat docks. Of course, they're madly in love, really, but the fact that Alice has a fiancé on board, to say nothing of her future mother-in-law, has prevented them from admitting anything more than their mutual adoration of Shirley. There's a grand wind-up in the divorce courts when their adopted daughter takes the witness stand and proves her parents are acting like spoiled children and shouldn't be granted a divorce. Robert Young and Alice Faye give thoroughly sympathetic characterizations. Helen Westley, representing the mother-in-law problem, is excellent, as is Arthur Treacher, who this time valets for Mr. Young.

★★ The Plough and the Stars

(RKO-Radio)

Add "The Plough and the Stars" to the recent deluge of films glorifying revolution in Ireland. This film, directed by John Ford, who made "The Informer," will be a distinct disappointment to most of his followers, for it lacks the vitality, the excitement and the fine performances which made "The Informer" one of the best pictures in the last several years. Barbara Stanwyck, in the role of the young wife who sees her dream of happiness shattered by the tragedy of the revolution, doesn't seem to be quite as inspired as usual in the part. Her acting is rather subdued throughout. Preston Foster's portrayal of the young husband is honest and sincere, but most of the high points of the picture are furnished by Barry Fitzgerald, of Dublin's Abbey Theatre Players. As a doddering but belligerent barfly, he brings to the screen a distinctly new type of comedy. Erin O'Brien-Moore is effective in a smaller role, and there are excellent bits by Una O'Connor and J. M. Kerrigan.

★★★ One in a Million

(20th Century-Fox)

This serves to introduce Sonja Henie, Olympic skating champion, to the screen public. Although the skating sequences—of which the picture has several—are marvels of rhythm and grace, Miss Henie's assets aren't confined to the ice. She photographs beautifully, she possesses a fetching Scandinavian accent, and her acting is more than acceptable. All of which means the screen has a distinctive new star. Plot of the picture concerns an American girls' band which is stranded in Switzerland. The band's conductor, Adolphe Menjou, and his wife, Arline Judge, furnish a good share of the film's comedy, and the Ritz Brothers have several frenzied scenes which will convulse their fans. Best of their numbers is "The Horror Boys of Hollywood," in which they impersonate Karloff, Laughton and Lorre. Don Ameche, portraying an American newspaperman in love with Miss Henie, is sincere and believable in the romantic scenes and a bit uncomfortable when he's the wisecracking reporter. Jean Hersholt contributes his usual ingratiating performance as Miss Henie's father, Leah Ray offers several pleasant songs, and Ned Sparks adds his dead pan touch to the comedy department. Borah Minnevitch and his harmonica band furnish three or four diverting musical novelties.

★★★ Lloyds of London

(20th Century-Fox)

Waving the flag for England, at which Hollywood producers are so superior to their British cousins, reaches almost a new high in this very entertaining film, which toys sufficiently with history to bring romance into the insurance business and show how closely interwoven were the fates of England and Lloyds. Done in the "Cavalcade" manner, this picture, with the help of Mr. Zanuck's private historians, shows how a boyhood friendship eventually saves the English Navy from a bitter defeat at the hands of Napoleon. The boys are Jonathan Blake and Horatio Nelson. Jonathan Blake grows up to become the most powerful member of Lloyds' insurance syndicate, and Horatio emerges as Admiral Nelson, the British naval hero.

"Lloyds of London" is superior screen fare largely because of several highly dramatic incidents, although a good deal of its appeal is due to its excellent cast. Freddie Bartholomew and Douglas Scott, as the two young friends, make the picture's early scenes memorable, and Tyrone Power as the grown-up Jonathan Blake, has all the attributes of a new screen hero. George Sanders, imported from England, is admirable as the villain of the piece, and there are fine performances by Sir Guy Standing, J. M. Kerrigan and C. Aubrey Smith. Madeleine Carroll, in the feminine lead, is both beautiful and competent, although the work of Virginia Field, as an alehouse maid, has more warmth and fire.

★★ Rainbow on the River

(RKO-Radio)

Bobby Breen, the boy sensation of the air waves, casts his magic spell once more on the screen in a film so dripping in sentiment that it will no doubt send women weeping from all the theatres in the land. Little Bobby, who has the singing mannerisms of a latter-day Al Jolson, is cast as an orphaned son of the old South who is mothered by an aging Negro mammy. This, of course, gives him an opportunity to display his mature vocal talents both in the cotton fields and in the local church where, as a choir boy, he furnishes the picture's high spot with his rendition of Schubert's "Ave Maria." It may not surprise you too much when the news comes that Bobby is really a member of a wealthy Northern family. When he is taken to New York he is, at first, not favorably received by his grumpy old grandmother (May Robson) and her scheming niece (Benita Hume). Seems Miss Robson's niece has a child of her own (Marilyn Knowlden), whom she hoped would eventually get the Robson fortune. Bobby's personality and his Harry Richman-like singing soon win the hearts of his grandmother and her comedy butler (Charlie Butterworth), and all ends as well as could be expected.

Critical comment on Master Breen is useless; either you like him or you despise him. May Robson comes through with her customary gruffness, Marilyn Knowlden is excellent as the spoiled brat and Charlie Butterworth lends humor to a thankless comedy role. Alan Mowbray is wasted in a small part.

★ White Hunter
(20th Century-Fox)

Before a background of obviously studio-manufactured jungle, Warner Baxter struggles grimly and silently with the elements. The wind and the rain and the elephants aren't nearly as formidable as the story, so Mr. B., who handles the storms and the livestock with expected ease, goes down to defeat at the hands of an impossible script. Embittered because his diplomatic career in London had been ruined by enemies, Baxter has become a white hunter—a guide to African tourists. The monotony of guzzling liquor and gazing at the horizon is ended when he is accidentally engaged by the very person who caused all his trouble. From then on revenge is his motive, but revenge eventually dissolves into love because of his enemy's beautiful daughter, June Lang.

Miss Lang, you will recall, is the gal who went through the entire war in "Road to Glory" with nary a smudge on her pretty pan. This time she's smudged a bit, but she manages to look at all times as though she had just dropped into the jungle on her way home from the beauty parlor. Warner Baxter's portrayal is convincing, but he acts as though he knew the odds were against him. Gail Patrick is properly menacing as the wife of Baxter's nemesis, and Alison Skipworth tries in vain to lend comedy to the piece. Suggested new title, "June in Jungle Land."

★★ Stolen Holiday
(Warners)

The Brothers Warner caution that all characters and events in Kay Francis' latest dramatic effort are "entirely fictional." Therefore, don't go comparing this film plot to the notorious swindling scandals that rocked France not long ago. It won't get you anywhere. The story won't either, for that matter, and merely serves as a platinum setting for the beauteous Miss Francis to display several coiffures, any number of fine gowns, and other properties exclusively hers. As a master swindler, Claude Rains dominates the cast in the part of the scoundrel, Orloff. Guilefully, he entangles Nicole Picot, a Paris mannequin (Kay Francis) in his affairs by making her an innocent accomplice to his first shady deal. In five years the arch-rogue is a millionaire; she becomes one of Paris' smartest couturiers. Their friendship, of course, is purely

BAD SKIN?

For Real Beauty—
You Must Have Soft
Alluring Skin
. . . Free From Pimples

Smooth, satiny skin—a radiantly clear, youthful complexion—men admire them and modern style demands them.

To be truly lovely, you must rid your skin of ugly pimples on face and body. And thousands are doing it, with complete success.

The real cause of disorders resulting in ugly pimples may be nothing in the world except a lack of the yeast vitamins B and G. When these elements are not present in the human diet in sufficient quantities, the intestinal tract becomes weak and sluggish. Its function is badly impaired. Constipation is likely to ensue and this, in turn, often shows up in pimply skin.

Countless men and women have found that in such cases, Yeast Foam Tablets work wonders. This pure dry yeast supplies vitamins B and G in abundant quantities and thus tends to restore the intestinal tract to normal—in those instances of vitamin deficiency. With the intestinal tract again in healthy function, pimples should quickly disappear.

Unlike ordinary yeast, Yeast Foam Tablets are pasteurized and hence cannot cause gas or fermentation. They are easy to swallow and most people relish their clean, nut-like taste. They keep, too. Start now. Try Yeast Foam Tablets and give them the chance to give you the same welcome relief they have brought to so many others.

NERVES? Vitamin B, known as the anti-neuritic vitamin, is absolutely necessary to sound, steady nerves. Lack of enough vitamin B causes polyneuritis—the inflammation of many nerves. Yeast Foam Tablets, so rich in the B factor, prevent and correct nervous conditions caused by vitamin B deficiency.

platonic. It isn't until Ian Hunter makes his appearance, struggling manfully to make the role of Diplomat Wayne credible, that Nicole knows Love. And then Love takes a terrible drubbing, as Orloff's financial kingdom topples; he forces Nicole into marriage to save himself. A convenient bullet solves Nicole's problem, but we're not going to tell you who gets the baby shrapnel. If you like lavish settings, fashion shows, Kay Francis in another sympathetic role tailored to her talents, you will see it anyway and find out for yourself. Alison Skipworth contributes necessary humor to the proceedings as Nicole's chaperone.

★ Champagne Waltz

(Paramount)

"Champagne Waltz" is a disappointment. With a cast headed by Gladys Swarthout, Fred MacMurray, and Jack Oakie one expects a gay and charming piece full of laughs and good music. The result, instead, is a rather dull, old-fashioned operetta which never lives up to the promise of its title. Theme of the story is the battle between waltz music and jazz. A descendant of Johann Strauss, Miss Swarthout and her grandfather operate a waltz palace in Vienna. Business is good until Jack Oakie opens an American swing palace featuring Fred MacMurray and his band. Miss Swarthout, unaware of MacMurray's identity, falls in love with him. It all ends up in a super-colossal night club in America featuring 200 musicians combining symphony and jazz—so terrific there's no room for customers. Miss Swarthout's lovely voice is not too well recorded, and her acting needs polishing. Fred MacMurray is acceptable as the American band leader, and Jack Oakie's comedy is the picture's greatest asset. Veloz and Yolanda perform several swell dance numbers, and Vivienne Osborne does nicely as a phoney Russian countess. One of the picture's minor mysteries is that Frank Forest, one of Hollywood's finest tenors, is not allowed to sing, while Fred MacMurray, who will never make the Met, has several vocal assignments.

★★ Sinner Take All

(M-G-M)

A fast-moving, well-paced murder mystery, that remains completely baffling until the denouement. Or maybe you're smarter than we are. Anyway, the film is distinguished from its contemporaries in that the police inspector is not dumb; he's as smart as the bright crime reporter (Bruce Cabot), and sometimes a step ahead of him in finding the archfiend who is popping off the Lanpiers, one at a time. Apparently David is killed first, then brother Stephen; finally their millionaire poppa, Aaron (Charley Grapewin). This leaves daughter Lorraine (Margaret Lindsay) as the last of the Lanpiers. But David doesn't actually die in the plotted auto crack-up.

■ ■ ■

Out on the "Love Is News" set Loretta Young was just melting into the strong arms of Tyrone Power when a prop man rushed up and whispered something to her. "Whoops!" yelled Loretta, disappearing into her dressing-room and bringing forth a clothes basket full of candy boxes which she breathlessly distributed to everyone on the set. The reason: Loretta had just become an aunt. Sister Polly Ann, who is Mrs. J. Carter Hermann of Pasadena, had just given birth to J. Carter Hermann, Jr. "This is the second time for me," said Loretta, "but I can't seem to get used to it." Sally Blane's and Norman Foster's daughter, Gretchen, caused the commotion last time.

"WHY DO I FEEL LIKE THIS?"

SO much trouble is caused by chronic constipation! Headaches, upset digestion, nervousness, lack of pep are frequently caused by poisonous wastes that accumulate in the bowels. Too often people merely use some temporary relief. See for yourself if it doesn't make a world of difference in the way you feel after using a purely vegetable laxative. Give a thorough trial to Nature's Remedy (NR Tablets). Note how gentle they are—and non-habit forming. Get a 25c box, containing 25 tablets, at any drugstore.

He lives to be killed later, in what appears to be a suicide. (P. S. It isn't.) This gives you an idea of the devious windings of the really swell plot. Nicely blended with Manhattan night life and Park Avenue pomp, the Whitman Chambers novel has been given intelligent attention by M-G-M; outfitted with players who give gilt-edged performances. Outstanding, of course, is Joseph Calleia. So is the stage's Stanley Ridges. There is fine trouping by Edward Pawley, George Zucco, Vivienne Osborne, Theodore Von Eltz, with Eadie Adams torching "I'd Be Lost Without You." Bruce Cabot, paroled from gangster roles, justifies his release. If you are a celebrity-seeker, watch for Dorothy Kilgallen, heroine of the recent reporters' aerial race around the globe. She's a "sob-sister" in the film. It's still good entertainment.

★★ Mind Your Own Business

(Paramount)

If you like Charlie Ruggles' absent-minded cut-ups, you will find this good entertainment. But we'd give you a gilt-edged guarantee that you won't have a dull moment watching this, anyhow. Alice Brady is the reason for such a seemingly rash statement. She is the Ruggles' better-half in this film, replacing Mary Boland—and doing a competent job of it. Charlie is just as devoted to Alice as he was to Mary, in spite of the grief she manages to cause him. Writer of a "Birds and Flowers" column in the local gazette, Ruggles has pursued the even tenor of his ways for some twenty years. But all is changed when he becomes ill, and the little woman takes over the column. Her style packs so much wallop that the townsfolk clamor for its continuance, with a consequence that poor Mr. R. has to turn to collecting gossip instead of posies to keep his readers satisfied. This winds up with gangsters gunning for him, kidnapping and plenty of excitement. Giving good characterizations, when the opportunity occasionally presents itself, are Lyle Talbot, Frankie Darro, Benny Baker, Gene Lockhart and Jack LaRue. But characterization, and even plot, fade into unimportance alongside a combination like the Ruggles-Brady one. They're the whole picture.

★★ College Holiday

(Paramount)

Vaudeville de luxe is here offered for the price of a seat at the movies—loge or second balcony. To give you an idea, there are the following headliners: Jack Benny, George Burns and Gracie Allen, Martha Raye, Mary Boland, Ben Blue and Eleanore Whitney. They're all up to their familiar and inimitable tricks which, combined, almost disguise the fact that what's missing is a story. The situation against which their antics are staged is this: Mary Boland is backing the efforts of Etienne Girardot, a fiend for health, who has a high hope of establishing an institution where romance can be fostered on a strictly eugenic basis. For this noble purpose she loans him her hotel, which is failing miserably under the directorship of Jack Benny. Thinking Jack is a cultist like themselves, the two keep him on the staff after he has rounded up college boys and girls from all over the country to come and stage a show to put the business on its feet. And these specimens are the experimental material for eugenic love. Among those to arrive are Martha Raye, Eleanore Whitney, Johnny Downs, Nick Lucats, and Leif Erikson. Then there's Girardot's daughter, Aphrodysia, who is also Gracie Allen, scouting for her perfect mate. It's good entertainment.

Come to Our Filmland Fiesta!

with your film favorites and enjoying an experience that couldn't be duplicated.

Three delightful afternoon cocktail parties have been arranged. Let's describe one for you in detail—Leo Carrillo's Spanish Fiesta Party.

From the hotel we'll all get into cars and go through Beverly Hills where homes of the stars will be a point of interest, and on to where Santa Monica lazes by the blue Pacific. Here is a cool, green canyon, site of Leo Carrillo's ranch, most colorful and historic spot in California.

Señor Carrillo, in fiesta dress and surrounded by his pals in the colony, will give you a hearty welcome. The star of "Gay Desperado" in person! And can you ever forget him with Grace Moore in "Love Me Forever"?

No more hospitable host could be found for our guests, and his fiesta will be a highlight of the trip. Leo has invited his friends to meet you—Dolores Del Rio, his neighbor across the canyon, Clark Gable, Richard Dix, and a host of other interesting stars.

WHILE the barbecue sizzles Leo will show you his stables, his collection of birds, the deer in his zoo, his rambling hacienda above the creek. This will be a real fiesta with all the trimmings, so don't forget to bring your kodaks and snap the colorful scene. We'll take a group photo of the party with the stars, too, so each will have a picture.

Lack of space prevents our describing this month the rollicking Golddiggers Party at Glenda Farrell's, or the Melting Pot Party at Richard Arlen's Toluca Lake estate, or the list of stars you'll see, but these will be described in a later issue of Modern Screen and also in the beautiful, illustrated booklet containing complete information which is yours for the mere asking.

Few people have a chance to see movies being made, but Modern Screen's vacationers will, through the special courtesy of the new Universal Studios, enjoy this rare privilege. Universal, oldest and largest of the studios, will be official hosts to our tours. Here you'll see acre upon acre of tremendous sets that go back to the time of "The Hunchback of Notre Dame," from Western villages where Buck Jones makes his thrilling Westerns, to the huge sets for Hollywood's biggest musical hit, "Top o' the Town," from the German village of "All Quiet on the Western Front" to the 1937 sequel, "The Road Back." Here Robert Taylor won fame in Irene Dunne's "Magnificent Obsession," Margaret Sullavan won stardom, and new stars are in the making every day. Deanna Durbin, the fourteen-year-old singer, is Universal's latest discovery. You'll meet the stars, see them make pictures.

Climaxing the Hollywood round of festivities will be a dinner dance at the Cocoanut Grove, for more than fifteen years the hub of Hollywood night life, famed throughout the world and as popular today as when Bing Crosby first crooned there and Joan Crawford and Carole Lombard won cups as the best dancers. Expensive even for a movie star, the Grove party costs nothing extra; just part of the many thrills planned for you. Many stars have been invited to this sparkling party; Robert Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck, Chester Morris and Robert Montgomery, Joe Penner and Jack Oakie, Alice Faye, Astrid Allwyn, Gloria Stuart, Loretta Young, Lee Tracy—but the list is long and certainly you'll see many stars before this evening is ended! Jean Harlow was queen of our dinner dance last year, and, of course, we hope she can join us again. Fred Keating, that debonair star of "Devil on Horseback," and "Melody for Two," was master of ceremonies and will repeat his kind offices this year.

WITH this brief sketch of the Hollywood doings of the jolly party we must go on to other plans. Your home in Hollywood will be the Hotel Plaza, at Hollywood Boulevard and Vine Street, the exact center of filmland. Here's the home also of the famed Cinnabar, most gorgeous night spot in Hollywood, and here, too, will be Leo Carrillo's "Corral," an exact duplicate of a Mexican village erected at a cost of $150,000, with singing señoritas, gay, colorful shops, and picturesque caballeros.

And there are dozens of exciting excursions for those who want to go exploring—Chinatown, Olvera Street, the mountain observatories, Gay's Lion Farm, Uncle Sam's great battle fleet at Long Beach (open to the public on week-ends) and the many amusement piers at Oceanside. A voyage to Santa Catalina Island can be made in a day. For lovers of art, there are the Huntington Library and Art Gallery, famed throughout the world, the Exposition Building, the colleges, Hollywood Bowl with its symphonies, old Missions built before our war of Independence.

The tours will also offer trips through Ranier National Park, Yosemite, Salt Lake City, the Grand Canyon, Seattle and many places that you've always longed to visit.

Here's a vacation you can easily afford to take, and simply can't afford to miss! Write in now for full particulars, or better yet, send in your reservation for a place on our house parties! Remember there are three tours to select from, for an all-expense vacation for two weeks. See you in Hollywood! Use This Coupon.

Martha Raye is all set. Right now she has a swell contract at Paramount, a weekly radio spot and the most expensive looking wire-haired terrier in Hollywood. We asked her about the hound the other day and discovered it isn't so valuable as it looks. "I wanted the worst looking mutt I could find." said Martha. "So I picked out this one at the dog pound for a dollar. Then I took him home and had him washed, and he turned out to be a wire-haired. So now I'm afraid to wash him again—he might be a Scottie beneath it all."

Rumors have been floating about that all is not well between Isabel Jewell and her fiance, Owen Crump. They must be nothing but rumors, however, for we've seen them out together three times within one recent week, and every time we talk to them they seem to be enjoying each other's company.

That fancy chin foliage for the extras on "Parnell" made a larger dent in the studio budget than the producers had planned. The initial cost of the beards was fairly nominal, but the fire department insisted that 12-inch cigarette holders be provided for each man. The production delays developed due to the fact that if the extras wanted to eat something besides whiskers for lunch they had to remove the vegetation. So rubber bags were provided for fifty men to allow them to tuck in the scenery and save studio time.

There's a soft heart behind the dead pan of Ned Sparks. Going into his apartment hotel one afternoon he saw one of the bellhops being carried past on a stretcher. The boy had had an acute appendicitis attack and was being rushed to the county hospital. Because Sparks happened to be there at the moment the boy was sent to Hollywood's most expensive hospital, with Ned's own doctor in attendance.

Here's a sample of Mary Pickford's philosophy, and perhaps it's a tip-off to why America's Sweetheart retains her youth. At the reception honoring her engagement to Buddy Rogers, someone asked her if she thought a difference in ages would stand in the way of a happy marriage. "No," said Mary, "because I firmly believe that in the sight of God we are all sixteen."

Lonely Hearts Division: Bob Taylor, lunching alone three days in a row at the Vine Street Brown Derby. (So you can't get a girl, eh, Taylor?) Gaping onlookers outside the restaurant who were curious enough to follow the shiny Taylor Packard discovered that it was visits to a Hollywood office building that caused the daily interim from his chores with M-G-M in Culver City.

Olivia de Havilland cried for a day and a half for scenes in "Call It a Day." In the middle of the second day's shooting the little lady's acting got the best of her and she became hysterical. So the company called it a day while Olivia went home and got herself thoroughly cried out.

■ ■ ■

And probably the best Simone Simon story around Hollywood is the one about the chap who knew her so well he called her by her first name.

■ ■ ■

The record for speedy divorces probably belongs to Lola Lane. We talked to her out at Warners on the "Marked Woman" set and she told us she had left work that morning at nine-thirty for the divorce court and was back on the set at eleven. And the only difficulty she had was explaining to the judge that her studio make-up wasn't yellow jaundice. Incidentally, the Lane gal is making herself a screen comeback in this new Bette Davis picture, and she'll surprise you with her swell singing voice—although it shouldn't be too much of a surprise, for her sisters, Rosemary and Priscilla, are doing very well in the vocal department of Fred Waring's band.

Famous as a skater, Sonja Henie makes her bow as a grand little actress in "One in a Million."

Harry Albiez, prop man on Director W. S. Van Dyke's pictures for the last twelve years, makes the best coffee in Hollywood—according to Van Dyke. And Bill Powell and Myrna Loy agreed the first few mornings on the "After the Thin Man" set. Then one morning Bill arrived to find no coffee. "You've got to be a blonde to get anywhere with Albiez," explained Van Dyke. Seems the chorus girls in the picture had done away with the morning's coffee supply. So next day Powell appeared in a blonde wig and one of Myrna's gowns and headed the coffee line-up. P. S. He got the Java.

Remember William S. Hart? In his day he was the shootingest two-gun hero the West ever knew. When he whipped out his trusty six-shooters every villain in Hollywood automatically bit the dust, and there wasn't a cattle rustlin' galoot west of Paramount who didn't cringe at the very mention of his name. Well, he has just issued his annual denial that he's about to make a screen comeback. In these days of sound and Technicolor and gowns by Adrian there ain't much left of the old West—and besides, Buck Jones and George O'Brien have pretty well cleaned out the local supply of tarnation varmints.

Added Note on the Clark Gable beard situation: Shortly after the battle of the beaver between Gable and Director John Stahl was won by Mr. G. and it was decided he wouldn't wear a beard in "Parnell," a woman in Seattle wrote to Clark offering to send him a sheaf of her own hair which she would like to see glued to the Gable chin. Gable still won't wear a beard.

■ ■ ■

Running out of gas on a lonely road outside Hollywood, Hugh Herbert walked into a nearby gas station only to discover he had no money with him. Returning to the car, he tried to hail a ride, but without success. Just to kill time until something happened, he began reading through a pack of fan mail he had brought from the studio. The last letter, Mr. H. swears, contained a dime from a woman who wanted his picture at any price. With the dime he rushed back to the gas station and phoned Mrs. Herbert, who came to the rescue. P. S. The woman got her picture, with a letter explaining what the dime had done for her hero.

Gertrude Niesen, in case you didn't know, is an ardent devotee of deep sea fishing. So—a few Sundays ago we braved the briny with her and a party of twelve not-so-gay spirits who had staggered out of bed at six to partake of the sport. Practically the only one of the guests who had ever seen a fish outside the Brown Derby was Craig Reynolds, who brought along a complete set of fancy equipment and spent the day casting, with perfect technique, from all parts of the boat. And guess who didn't catch a thing?

Marlene Dietrich item: The glamorous Miss D., buying a few dozen hats in a London shop, happened to spot a toque of silver fox. "Quite effective," she murmured, tilting it over a famed eyebrow. Then, turning to the clerk, she said: "Will you call the International Fur Shop and ask them to send up a silver fox coat? I believe this hat really needs an extra touch." It's a nice whim, if you can afford it.

Economy, however, is not unknown to some of the Hollywood gentry. Elaine Barrie Barrymore has just announced that John's half-million-dollar yacht, The Infanta, can now be had for $50,000. Reports are that Elaine prefers the land, and that John has decided they can have more fun on $50,000 than they can on the yacht.

Dainty new vanishing cream

KEEPS UNDERARMS ABSOLUTELY DRY AND ODORLESS lets dreams come true

TABOO
STOPS PERSPIRATION

A mere deodorant isn't enough. Perspiration wetness is as chilling to hearts as perspiration odor. TABOO completely disposes of both. Keeps underarms perfectly dry...keeps them absolutely odorless ...freshly sweet. And TABOO is as delightful itself as the charm it guards. Not medicinal. Just a smooth, delicately scented, pure white vanishing cream that instantly disappears into the skin, where it remains for days the loyal friend of romance. Remember...TABOO actually stops perspiration! Fifty cents at better toilet goods counters!

APPLY ONE NIGHT... BE SAFE FOR DAYS... TABOO..

Hearts were Trumps

[UNTIL SHE SMILED]

She evades close-ups . . . Dingy teeth and tender gums destroy her charm . . . She ignored the warning of "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

THAT chance meeting—what it has done for thousands of girls. That first glance—what it has done to thousands of men. Even before a word is spoken—an opinion is formed, an impression made.

And then—she smiles! What a triumph if that smile is lovely, winning, captivating. But if it reveals dull teeth and dingy gums, how quickly the spell is broken—how swiftly the glamorous moment is lost.

NEVER NEGLECT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

Play safe—protect your smile! If your tooth brush has flashed that warning tinge of "pink"—see your dentist. For "pink tooth brush" is a signal of distress from your gums. It may be the first sign of serious gum disorders—it is emphatically something that should not be left to chance.

Don't take chances. You may not be in for serious trouble—but your dentist should decide. Usually, however, the verdict will be "just another case of lazy, underworked gums—gums robbed of exercise by our present-day soft and fibreless foods." They need more work, more stimulation—and as so many dentists frankly suggest—the stimulating help of Ipana and massage. For Ipana is a double-duty tooth paste that not only keeps teeth white and sparkling but, with massage, helps gums stay firm and healthier. Rub a little extra Ipana on your gums every time you brush your teeth. Circulation quickens. Gums become firmer. Your teeth sparkle with a whiter, brighter look.

Change to Ipana and massage today—help safeguard yourself from troubles of the gums. Regular use of Ipana with massage will do much to keep your teeth brighter—your gums healthier. Keep your smile a winning smile—lovely, captivating!

BILIOUS AND UPSET AGAIN!

● One look at my coated tongue told me why I was headachy, desk-weary, out of sorts. I was constipated, bilious. But the laxatives I had always taken were so repulsive. Right there and then I decided to stop being a martyr to bad-tasting "doses." I got a box of FEEN-A-MINT, the popular chewing gum laxative my friends praised as modern, really different!

● FEEN-A-MINT worked like a charm. Next day I felt like a million. Headache gone. Stomach sweet as clover. Back came the old appetite and pep. I looked better, felt better, slept better. And believe me, FEEN-A-MINT is a pleasure to take. It really tastes good and it certainly acts smoothly! No wonder it's popular.

GOT RELIEF THIS WAY
THE 3 MINUTE WAY!
Three minutes of chewing make the difference

● According to scientists, one of the chief differences in FEEN-A-MINT is the 3 minutes of chewing. This is what helps make it so thorough and dependable. FEEN-A-MINT acts gently in lower bowel—not in the stomach. No griping. No upset digestion. Not habit-forming. Economical. Try FEEN-A-MINT, the delicious mint-flavored laxative used and praised by more than 16 million, young and old. Write for free sample. Dept. Q-10, FEEN-A-MINT, Newark, N.J.

OFF TO HOLLYWOOD!

Besides visiting with the stars — and Glenda Farrell is one of your hostesses —our vacationers are in for a treat

By Jack Smalley

Glenda Farrell would like you to visit her!

IT'S GOING to be a party, a Gold Diggers' Party because Glenda Farrell pertly insists that all girls have a touch—just a touch—of the gold digger in them. And you're invited!

No typical feminine excuses such as, "I haven't a thing to wear," will get you out of it. Even the somewhat difficult problem of how to get there has been neatly solved by MODERN SCREEN.

It's this way: figuring that everybody, even a poor woikin' gal, has to have a vacation, we've arranged for everything, down to the last detail, and you can now come to Hollywood on a two weeks' trip (or eleven days if you prefer) to see the world and meet the stars in person.

AS FOR the cost of all this, we've figured that out, too. By traveling in a house party, aboard a special train, and getting special rates at hotels, we've found that amazing economies can be made. You can come out for as little as $137! But you'll want to study all these details in the free, illustrated folder which is yours for the asking. It tells the itinerary of each of three trips, so you can arrange your vacation to suit any one of them.

Each tour has its starting point in Chicago, leaving July 2, Aug. 1, and August 15. So start saving or gold digging right now, and make your mind up to going on a vacation this year that you'll never forget!

You'll be crazy about Glenda Farrell. She's the grandest scout in all these here now Hollywoods, and her big home in San Fernando will be the scene of rare festivities when you arrive. She's to be hostess of the second tour leaving Aug. 1, according to present plans. Leo Carrillo is host of the first tour, entertaining at his Santa Monica ranch with a barbecue and fiesta, while Richard Arlen has the welcome mat out for the eleven-day trippers.

GLENDA IS now in England, making a picture at the Warner Brothers London studio, but she'll be back in plenty of time. It's her first trip abroad, and she's getting as big a kick out of her journey as you'll have crossing the Rockies and unlocking all those barred gates in Hollywood. This Farrell girl is forever doing the unexpected. Her friends arrived one night for a cocktail party and found Glenda, dressed in a lovely new evening gown, de-fleaing the cat on the back porch! Her house brims with noisy good humor when the gang drops in. She invited a star over for dinner one night, saying "Stokowski is coming and we'll just have a nice quiet evening."

"At the Farrells?" cracked the star.

One time Glenda got a letter from a high-school boy in Hollywood. He explained he had boasted about "his friend," Glenda Farrell, and now his schoolmates had decided he was just kidding them. So would she go with him to the school dance? And b'gosh, Glenda did! She's really terrific. Can you afford to miss her party?

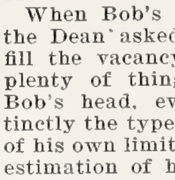
THE BAROMETER TELLS A SIX MONTHS' POPULARITY STORY. ARE YOU BOOSTING YOUR FAVORITES?

Motion picture producers have their eyes on the Information Desk's trusty Barometer these days. They know it's your requests for life stories of your favorites that make the fascinating old needle swing responsively back and forth among the various young stars. .They trust the Barometer implicitly because it's so infinitely much more instructive than any similar poll or questionnaire. Other polls announce who's tops on the first of January of each year. But January first is only one day out of 365. Your Barometer, on the contrary, tells a six months' popularity story, an ever changing story. Help complete the tale the needle tells, the tale the producers must read, by sending in your own requests—as many as you choose!

If you'd like to see a brief synopsis of your favorite's life in this department, and, incidentally, help boost his or her standing in our Barometer, fill in and send us the coupon on this page, or just write. Try to save yourself 2c by using postcards whenever possible. We answer general questions, too, either here or by mail. Address: The Information Desk, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

ROBERT TAYLOR (Last printed January, 1937. Total number of requests since then 600.) If success ever goes to Robert Taylor's head, dismayed leopards in every zoo in the country will start changing their spots. Right now, the leopards haven't much to worry about. Bob's personality is too well knit for conceit to alter it. He was brought up to take a serious, level-headed view of life. His earliest recollection is trotting off to medical school at the heels of his daddy, absorbing the ponderous lectures almost before he could talk. As a boy, he hoarded his pennies, not to buy himself a catcher's mitt, but to get his mother flowers. And at the age when a young man's fancy turns a bit prematurely to the opposite sex, Bob's vital interest in life was his music, his public speaking. A high-school speech won him a trip to Detroit—all the way from Beatrice, Nebraska. Later, at Doane College, he won a speaking prize right from under the noses of three ordained ministers, each of whom had been a contestant.



When Bob's music professor left Doane the Dean asked Bob whether he wouldn't fill the vacancy. So you see, there were plenty of things that could have turned Bob's head, even then. But Bob is distinctly the type that's much more conscious of his own limitations than of other people's estimation of himself. Rather than accept the job of youngest member of the Doane faculty, he followed his cello professor out to Pomona College, in California, to learn more. At Pomona, the boys and girls started out by calling Bob "The Sheik," but not for long. There is a certain unmistakable air of importance and purposiveness about Bob that sheds ridicule and flattery alike. And so at Pomona, as at Doane, he became the most respected undergraduate. When, as a result of the striking performances he had given in college dramatics, he was given an interview with Louis B. Mayer, that respect was confirmed.

The rest of Bob's story is history to all except Bob himself. His first pitiful pay check of $35.00; his fateful appearance in "Society Doctor" in the sympathetic but small role of a young interne; the sweeping flood of fan mail that his understanding and sincere portrayal occasioned; the fact that in less than one year he had become a second Valentino. To Bob there is nothing historical about any of this. It has not changed him. He goes on living the way he always did—quietly and very simply. He will not allow his public life to intrude on and destroy his private life, his personality. No one knows this better than "his girl," Barbara Stanwyck, his girl, because she, like himself, removes her glamor with her make-up. Bob's next picture, after "Personal Property" is "This Is My Affair."

SALLY GREBAUSKAS, Altoona, Pa.: You're not the only one who'd like to know who the trailers are in the Information Desk "request poll." As a matter of fact, we're not trying to keep it a secret. It's just that we haven't room in our Barometer for more than five names. If you or anyone else is

You'll find this chart simple to follow and a valuable guide in choosing film entertainment. Instead of giving you the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

–"why don't I get Mennen Antiseptic Powder to fight off germs?"

"Gosh, I can hardly keep from cryin'. Why do they use ordinary baby powder on me—when they might just as easy give me Mennen Borated Powder—the kind that's Antiseptic. My Doc says this powder keeps a feller's skin safe from germs and infection. And—Gee willikens—that's what I want! Believe me, germs are the things that scare me. Besides . . . my Doc says this Mennen Powder is swell for preventin' chafin', and that it heals up bruises and prickly heat quicker 'n anything else. So please somebody tell my mother to get me Mennen Antiseptic Powder."

More doctors recommend Mennen Antiseptic Powder than all other baby powders combined—that's what a recent survey by a leading medical journal showed.

Would You Have Chosen Them?

Up until last week, if I had had to choose a good-looking quality actor for a serious, youthful, romantic lead in an expensive production, I should have had to choose from three—Gary Cooper, Fredric March and Ronald Colman, the only men, in my opinion, fine enough actors and sufficiently good-looking and young in appearance to win the heart of a connoisseur.

Rarely does one find a handsome, extremely young man who portrays depth of character convincingly. Robert Taylor, although handsome, is no more than a playboy, regardless of his role. Likewise Errol Flynn, who grinned amiably through the serious "Green Light."

However, I have enjoyed another memorable picture—"Lloyds of London"—was captivated by the heavy-lashed, deep-set, expressive, dark eyes and beautiful mouth of the exceedingly young leading man, pleased with his slender figure. I was jubilant to find the all important poise and a speech that was exactly right—not oratorical or stagey, not amateurishly mouthed or annoyingly high-pitched.

May I recommend Tyrone Power as the youngest and most handsome of the quality actors?—L. Golden, Wichita, Kansas.

Shirley Temple, Trouper

Why, with all the popularity that Shirley Temple enjoys, are there people who will not believe that she is really the adorable little angel she portrays? Why aren't they thankful for her loveliness, her really childlike simplicity, and why bewail the fact that she doesn't portray a problem child? Shirley's curls are indeed a bit too perfect; but I have seen such well-be-haved hair before, and natural, too.

Shirley, in growing, has lost her baby-prettiness, but regardless of her knowing what it is all about when she acts, how could she still look the baby of three-and-a-half at the age of eight? She has lost some of her spontaneity, but she has the joie de vivre which goes into the making of a great personality, and after over four years of trouping, who wouldn't change?

What, Gene Autry, ain'tcha got no Fan Club? Well, one of this month's winners is going to fix that.

Results of Between You 'n' Me Popularity Poll appear on Page 88.

The object of my adoration is one who has created the most popular type of cowboys in movie history—singing cowboys—and the most popular type of Westerns—musical Westerns. I am referring to that singing, smiling, oh-so-charming, Texan heart-breaker, Gene Autry.

Please, please, won't you treat Gene as a "parlor hero" and print portraits of him and interviews, 'n' everything? Puleeze! If I said "Please print a BIG picture of Gene Autry," you wouldn't bat an editorial eyelash, would you? But if I said the same thing nine hundred and ninety-nine times, count 'em—(No, we're not mathematically inclined, so we just glanced at those twenty-seven and a half pages of "Please print a BIG," etc. and decided that one of us must be mad.—Editor's Note.)

Too Much Music in Pictures?

The music in the greater percentage of motion pictures is so loud as to drive one who sits and listens to it for an hour or more almost mad. I have actually sat in a theatre and held my ears to shut out some of the blaring so-called music. I have seen otherwise fine pictures ruined simply by the music which was played during the entire picture and even during dialogue, when I have had to strain my ears to hear what the actors were saying.

There certainly is no relaxation in going to a picture that puts one under such a strain. I believe that music has its place in every production, but why doesn't the music director realize that much of the music is too loud and that there are many places in a picture where there should be absolutely no music.

I feel that I voice the opinion of many in this letter and hope that it may have a good influence toward softer and less music in pictures.—Mrs. J. F. Remaley, Du Bois, Pa.

Fetch me my sun glawses! I'm positively dazzled by that April issue of MODERN SCREEN, of course. It was colossal, gigantic, magnificent—oh, gee, it was scrumptious. That scoop—Off Their Guard—was delicious and the Good News was so newsy—I just et it up. The snapshots of the stars "here and there" are always swell.

But, oh, yes, there's always a but—something vitally important was missing in that almost perfect issue. There was nothing about Nelson Eddy in it.

Also, have a heart and make the crossword puzzle just a leetle easier. I was in a sweat trying to figure out this one. And you can imagine my surprise, amazement, astonishment, etc., when I discovered that Greta Garbo was the girl in the picture. My, how you've changed, Greta.—Patricia Madden, Yonkers, N. Y.

The Autograph Racket

It is high time that someone came to the defense of cinema stars in an effort to put an end to the rackets so many of their adoring fans are engaged in.

Take the autograph hound. In trailing an actress to get her John Hancock on a piece of paper, he pushes, intrudes, and acts rude, generally, in his effort. If the star refuses to come across, the fan calls her an old meanie, a snob, or a dozen other undeserved epithets. He sees only the player's refusal to be victimized—not his own rudeness and lack of common decency. So he says to himself, "Well, I'll be darned if I ever see that dame in another film."

As to fan mail, why should a star be compelled to hire secretaries to answer the frothings of a bunch of adolescent minds? It's a racket and film players should not be criticized for objecting to it.

"But," you say, "don't we pay our good money to see these stars in the movies?"

Yes, my dears, you do. But why should you think you are doing them a favor by going? Don't you get about three hours of grand entertainment for your money? The price of your ticket merely entitles you to be entertained by the players; saying that they owe you something for having enjoyed them in the pictures isn't exactly fair.—Mrs. C. Anderson, Flushing, N. Y.

How About It, Clark?

On seeing a letter about Robert Taylor not answering his fan mail in a recent Between You and Me column, I'd like to make it public that Mr. Taylor answered my request very promptly.

However, my complaint is that Clark Gable hasn't answered one of the six letters I've written him since 1932. In each case, I've allowed him six months to answer, but still no reply. Eighteen months ago, I even bought a photo and sent it to him to autograph and return. I've never seen it since!

I still think that Mr. Gable's secretary is to blame, as I cannot imagine Clark himself ignoring requests for an autograph.

If you see this, Mr. Gable, please send me one without a mustache—personally autographed to me. I think I deserve it, don't you?—E. Moorhouse, Liverpool, England.

Is That Nice, Mr. Taylor?

I would like to make a complaint about Robert Taylor's famous secretaries. About three months ago, I sent Mr. Taylor an autograph book to sign. I enclosed the money for its return, yet I have never seen it again. The least that could have been done would have been to send the book back. Signed or unsigned, I still want it.

Just to show the difference between stars, I had sent that same book to Nelson Eddy. In a few weeks time I received my book, beautifully wrapped, with the longed-for signature inside.—Ellen Leclerc, Montreal, Canada.

DINING WITH

By Marjorie Deen

Waiting for company? No, dinner for two, this time. The Ameches are ready for some of Honore's Fried Chicken.

THERE'S ALWAYS a "Welcome" on the mat at Don Ameche's charming Spanish-style hillside house. Don and his attractive blonde young wife, Honore, are hospitable souls, and they live up to the meaning of their name, Ameche—an anglicized version of the Italian word for friends.

Giving Sunday night suppers is one of their favorite ways of dispensing hospitality. For some of these informal get-togethers they issue invitations. But they also love to have people just drop in and stay as long as they like. And as guests usually "like" to stay for hours and hours in their little house with the wide windows, overlooking the beautiful Encino Valley, chances are that even the most casual callers will find themselves being asked to dinner.

It's amazing, when you think of it, that the Ameches are always prepared for the "extra guests." At least, it seems so to me. And more amazing, still, is the fact that there's never any confusion in their household over these last-minute additions, in spite of the fact that Honore runs her home quite simply. When Don brings home a surprise dinner guest any old night of the week, his unruffled wife is actually glad, she told me. To which I could only gasp that this certainly made her "tops" with me, in housewifely patience and consideration.

Or maybe you don't think that this is so remarkable. Maybe you, too, are one of those sweet souls who can give a warm reception to hubby's boss, or your own Aunt Nelly, when they march in without warning—just when you're planning on lamb chops for dinner, too! Well, in my opinion, even the most hospitable, versatile hostess would have some excuse for being flustered under those circumstances, for somehow you just can't "stretch" a lamb chop, can you?

But according to Honore, you can serve a fine meal, even on such short notice, or rather, on no notice at all. Perhaps I had better explain here that Don Ameche's capable young wife had considerable experience as a dietitian in and around Chicago, before her marriage, so it's safe to say she knows what she's talking about.

Not only did she give me some swell suggestions that I'm going to pass on to you—ideas which will show you how to pad and stretch the meals originally intended for "just the family," so as to prove ample for an additional two or three—but she also gave me some grand recipes for dishes.

There will be room to give you a couple of these recipes of hers,

Cherries, Philadelphia cream cheese and nuts help to make this delicious fruit salad a springtime delight.

Uninvited guests don't worry the Ameches—Honore knows how later on. The others, which I shall tell you more about as we go along, have been printed up on recipe cards, and are yours for the asking. Just fill out and mail the coupon at the end of this article, and you'll receive a copy of all of them, absolutely free! They'll make the same hit, I'll wager, with your family and the friends that drop in on you unexpectedly, as they do with Don Ameche and his friends. And that's saying quite a lot, judging from the things Don had to say about Honore's catering.

LET'S SEE then, what would we be likely to have if we were to drop in on the Ameches? It wouldn't be elaborate fare, I can promise you that. Wholesome American cooking at its best would probably be prepared for you, according to Honore's directions. Well-seasoned meat dishes; that good old vegetable standby, corn, in a tasty new guise; shrimps in a delectable sauce, just so as not to overlook the fish family entirely. Then there is that justly popular favorite, spaghetti, further enhanced by a quickly-made, filling meat-sauce. For luncheon, there would be a fruit salad, perhaps, with the one pictured at the beginning of this article holding a deserved place of honor. Nor must I forget to mention the lightest, most speedily thrown together small cakes I've ever tried.

For, of course, I have tried out all these recipes myself, since meeting the Ameches, not only to satisfy my own curiosity, but to be sure, as always, that I left nothing out when copying them down for you. That's how I'm able to tell you about each one of these delectable dishes from first-hand knowledge as well as from hearsay. So let's start on this list of good things to eat that I've just outlined for you, and while taking them up one by one, we can also discuss some of (Continued on page 72)

BOB, I can't stand it any longer. Your constant criticism is driving me crazy. I'm going away for good.

Aunt Susan: But why? How did it happen, Daisy?

Daisy: Oh, Aunty, it's been one row after another for months! Every morning he kicked about his shirts—they looked so gray and dingy. A few nights ago we had company and Bob said the linens were a disgrace. We had a nasty scene and I walked out.

Aunt Susan: Honey, I know it sounds mean to bring this up now. But why don't you do something to get that tattle-tale gray out of your clothes?

Daisy: Good glory, I work like blazes. What on earth more can I do?

Aunt Susan: Stop using those "trick" powdery soaps that don't wash clean, and switch to Fels-Naptha Soap. It's one sure way to get all the dirt—thanks to its wonderfully rich golden soap with lots of naptha right in it.

Daisy: Oh, why didn't I think of that before! I'll try Fels-Naptha right away!

FEW WEEKS LATER

Bob: Gosh, but I'm glad you're back, Daisy. And I promise I'll never nag again as long as . . .

★★★★ Call It a Day

Here is one of those completely enjoyable pictures which comes along every once in a while and surprises everyone, including, perhaps, its producers. The story is a delightful bit of semi-fantasy, dealing with a day in the lives of a rather staid English family. Spring comes to all of them at once, and each one gets involved in his own little romantic complication. The father (Ian Hunter), a conservative accountant, finds himself hopelessly involved with an American actress. The mother (Frieda Inescort) is horrified to discover herself almost compromised by a sudden suitor (Roland Young) from the Far East. The eldest daughter (Olivia de Havilland) is smitten by the charms of a portrait painter (Walter Woolf King). The son (Peter Willes) gives up his plans to motor on the Continent when he gets a look at the gal next door (Anita Louise). And the younger daughter (Bonita Granville) falls in love with a painting. Incidentally, Bonita again proves herself a remarkable little actress.

Everything everyone does is beautifully daffy, and the dialogue writers have contrived swell comedy for them. There are also top-notch performances by Alice Brady, the well-meaning friend of Frieda Inescort, and Peggy Wood, as the painter's understanding wife. "Call It a Day" represents the best all-around acting of the season. Directed by Archie Mayo.—Warner Bros.

★★★ Swing High, Swing Low

The revised and modernized edition of the old play, "Burlesque," turns out to be more than agreeable entertainment, mainly because of the engaging presence of Carole Lombard and Fred MacMurray and the intelligent direction of Mitchell Leisen, who guided the same pair through "Hands Across the Table." In the play the central character was a hoofer; in the picture he's a hot trumpet player.

Miss Lombard, as the gal who marries MacMurray and watches his hot trumpeting send him up the ladder of Broadway fame and down again, demonstrates a surprising ability for heavy dramatics. Her comedy sequences, of course, are handled with her usual flair. The role of the irresponsible musician offers Fred MacMurray exactly the type of role for which he's best suited, and he makes the most of it.

Another Lombard surprise is her singing of "I Hear a Call to Arms," which she vocalizes with excellent results. Other good tunes are the title number and "Panamania," sung by Dorothy Lamour, who does a nice bit of work as the Other Woman. Swell comedy romance is furnished by Charlie Butterworth and Jean Dixon, and smaller roles are ably handled by Harvey Stephens, Charles Judels and Cecil Cunningham.—Paramount.

★★★ History Is Made at Night

Romance comes to the restaurant business in this light-hearted comedy of emotional conflict, all of which should be good news to those who heretofore have regarded their favorite dining place as a more or less prosaic and commercial establishment. In real life, one finds, the main trouble is that headwaiters are seldom Charles Boyer. The screen, which can always stretch a point or two, makes M. Boyer maître d' of a smart Paris restaurant. Wandering into the kitchen, you'll find Leo Carrillo acting as chef, and proclaiming himself the world's finest. On his night off, M. Boyer meets Jean Arthur, the estranged wife of a wealthy English shipbuilder, and they fall in love. Complications arise, and the psychopathically jealous husband makes life miserable for the two of them, climaxing his hatred for them by running one of his own ships, on which they are passengers, into an iceberg. Outside of this rather fantastic bit of drama, which attempts a climax obviously inspired by "San Francisco," the film is amusing and gay. Boyer adds to his repertoire of skilfully etched portrayals, and Jean Arthur continues to be one of the most delightful of the screen's feminine players. Leo Carrillo's comedy is sure-fire, and Colin Clive ably portrays the jealous husband. Directed by Frank Borzage.—Walter Wanger-United Artists.

OF TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★★ Maytime

Jeanette MacDonald and Nelson Eddy continue their series of co-starring ventures with a musical which is certain to be the season's tops in sweetness. M-G-M has spared no expense in dropping apple blossoms all over the scenery, and the performances of the two stars are in keeping with the saccharine atmosphere which surrounds them.

If you don't remember the story, it's the one about the young singer who gives up love and happiness to marry her concert manager, who was responsible for her career. It is told in retrospect, with Jeanette MacDonald in the earlier scenes as an old woman giving counsel to a young girl about to make the same mistake she herself made.

"Maytime" is recommended because it allows Miss MacDonald and Mr. Eddy more than ample opportunity to display their vocal talents. The music offered runs the gamut, from "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny" to a cleverly contrived opera set to the music of Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. Miss MacDonald's most fetching number is "Sweetheart," from "Maytime's" original Romberg score, and Mr. Eddy is most effective in a lusty drinking song. Acting honors go to John Barrymore, while Tom Brown, Lynne Carver and Rafaela Ottiano give fine performances.—M-G-M.

★★★ Seventh Heaven

"Seventh Heaven," any confirmed movie-goer will recall, was the picture which brought stardom to Janet Gaynor and Charles Farrell. The same producing company now emerges with a new version of that love story of the Paris streets, and it will probably do as much for Simone Simon and Jimmy Stewart as it did for the Gaynor-Farrell team. This doesn't mean, of course, that we're due for a series of Simon-Stewart co-starring vehicles. One good reason for that is that they're under contract to different studios. But "Seventh Heaven" will bring each of them the acclaim and the popularity which many players wait years to attain.

Simone brings a poignant beauty to her role of Diane, and Stewart, as Chico, the sewer worker who becomes Diane's lover, establishes himself as one of the better actors among the screen's leading men. He is especially good in the scenes of his exultation over becoming "a man of position"—a street cleaner. Best in the supporting cast is Gregory Ratoff, as an exuberant hack-driver friend of Chico's. Almost as good is Victor Kilian, "a man of position," who welcomes Chico into his select company. Others interesting in smaller roles are Gale Sondergaard, Jean Hersholt, John Qualen and J. Edward Bromberg. Directed by Henry King. —20th Century-Fox.

★★★ Personal Property

This is a remake of "Man in Possession," which starred Robert Montgomery several seasons back. In its 1937 version it exhibits the charms of Bob Taylor and Jean Harlow, who represent pretty near the tops in Hollywood's male and female beauty these days.

The story concerns the black sheep of an English family who casts amorous eyes on the fiancée of his stuffy older brother. The lovely lady is about to be ejected from her home by a mercenary sheriff, and our hero, in order to be near her, goes on the sheriff's payroll and a one-man sit-down strike in the gal's home to make sure she doesn't move out her belongings before the law can take its course. It's an amusing situation, and it will do critics no good to report that many of the incidents are phony and that a number of the gags are reminiscent of the old vaudeville days.

Audiences will love the picture because of the presence of the two stars. Bob Taylor's acting is improving with each new picture, but he still seems to find himself a bit uncomfortable in nonchalant comedy roles of this type. Jean Harlow exhibits all her attractions effectively, and in the supporting cast Reginald Mason, E. E. Clive, Cora Witherspoon and Forrester Harvey are outstanding. Directed by W. S. Van Dyke.—M-G-M.

MEN OF THE MOMENT

Brian Aherne's a handsome gent and a fine actor, so why don't you clamor for his photograph? There's a reason.

That attractive male platinum, Gene Raymond (right), should be a big star. But, somehow, he just isn't. Why?

Now, there's Clark Gable, on the other hand. Yes, indeed, there's C. G.—way up thar' in the film firmament, where the girls can see and adore him.

HOLLYWOOD, glamor center of the world, probably harbors more broken hearts—and hopes—than any other given metropolis. Thousands travel each year to the cinema city to try their luck in the fickle films. With the possible exception of Broadway, it is the toughest nut to crack that has ever grown.

Yet, on the other hand, Fate is kind to a select group which she deems worthy of her far too few smiles, for occasionally there are those who, overnight, rise to the heights. Among these are our "men of the moment" —the matinee idols of today.

Did you ever wonder why Clark Gable, Robert Taylor and Errol Flynn achieved fame? Or why some of the finest actors have failed to click as idols? Some claim that stars are born and not made, while others insist that it's all just luck.

Robert Taylor once remarked, "I only hope my luck will hold out until I can learn to act."

Whether or not he's a great actor, you'll have to admit that Mr. Taylor has done all right for himself. Today he is the most popular young star in the picture business. Yes, Bob is a bonafide, dyed-in-the-wool matinee idol. The public took to him like the proverbial duck to water and he is the only person ever to equal the record for sudden popularity set by the late Rudolph Valentino.

By Robert H. McIlwaine

Do you know that there's a vast difference between acting ability and star stuff—and that the boys who have "it" become matinee idols?

On the other hand, there is Brian Aherne. One of the finest actors on either side of the Atlantic, he is nevertheless not a near-idol for even a single matinee. The reason isn't lack of opportunity with this man, for he is one of the busiest of our leading men. Dividing his time between films and the legitimate stage, Aherne doesn't have an idle moment.

Lately seen in "Beloved Enemy," and acclaimed by the critics as a fine actor, he still failed to click as a big picture personality. Perhaps there are several explanations for this. I wonder if one could be that he doesn't possess the warm appeal that is so necessarily a part of personality; that is, if said personality is to be taken into the hearts of the public. The majority of movie audiences are comprised of women, and the ladies do like to look on their stars with romance-tinted glances rather than histrionic prowess.

Brian Aherne is certainly an attractive, intelligent man and there isn't a girl who wouldn't think him most entertaining over a cocktail or dinner. Nevertheless, her interest would usually remain of a cordial but impersonal nature.

This past winter when Aherne appeared on the Broadway stage with Walter Huston in "Othello," he scored a tremendous success. In fact, his New York audiences took him to their hearts, mentally aiding and abetting him in his dastardly schemes as the treacherous Iago. They gloried in his villainy and applauded him lavishly, proving (Continued on page 109)

THE DEB'S DELIGHT

Believe it or not, several movie Misses have proposed to Johnny that it would be grand to be Mrs. Downs!

Looks like Eleanore Whitney and Kay Griffith have a neat hold on the young man. And Johnny isn't complaining.

By Ben Maddox

JOHNNY DOWNS never had a date until a year ago. He never went to a conventional school a single day in his life. Although he typifies Young America at its best, ranging in pictures from home boy to snappy undergraduate, he himself has never experienced the everyday family life nor has he ever been rushed by a fraternity.

Now, at half-past twenty-two, he is really one more example of the strangeness of the most extraordinary city in the world. If anyone deserves to be catalogued as Exhibit A, young man of Hollywood, Johnny does. For he hasn't just drifted into the spotlight; he isn't recently movie-struck. Actually, he is a genuine product of the film industry. Literally, he is the one new juvenile who grew up in its atmosphere.

His childhood was spent before the cameras. During his high-school age he was touring the country, making personal appearances. When he might have been a freshman for dear old U. S. C., he was pounding the pavements of Broadway to get another nod from Hollywood's moguls.

He still hasn't a house. He's known a series of apartments and his backyard was usually Hollywood Boulevard. He must use his imagination to figure out what it would be like to stay in one neighborhood and have the same friends. He never had a chance at the high-school play, you see, nor a crack at football. If, today, he should receive an invitation to a prom, and could make it, he'd be the perfect escort, but inside himself he'd be overwhelmed with a weird excitement.

Because when it was time for Johnny to enroll in the first grade, he went into films instead. The studios have been his alma mater, awarding him better roles in lieu of diplomas, and no part at all rather than a summons to the principal's office. He got reviews in place of report cards. The casting directors have been his deans.

In person Johnny Downs is good-looking, well-bred and exactly dashing enough. He is the type who, on a date, could be swell fun without being flip. He might want to neck, but he wouldn't want to be naughty. So no wonder the pick of Hollywood's younger set are glad to go out with him. Indeed, he is the movie deb's delight! Medium tall, with a lithe strength behind his slimness, his eyes and hair are that warm brown, and his complexion that olive shade, that most girls seem to be specifying in a model boy friend. He doesn't throw his vigor at you, either. Johnny's vital without being perpetually peppy.

He not only conducts himself like a gentleman, but—perhaps more amazing—he thinks like one. It's pretty astonishing to find him the sort of fellow he is after constant exposure to Hollywood. The answer to whether he's a gay young blade is yes—and no. It requires, like Johnny, a deal of explaining. (Continued on page 102)

WHAT HAS SUCCESS DONE TO ROBERT TAYLOR?

Bob came from an average American family, in an average American town, where he lived an average American life.

By James Reid

Has fame affected him? Has money spoiled him? Here is a story stranger than this star's sudden popularity

IT WAS just one year ago that you were becoming conscious of Robert Taylor in a big way. He had been under contract to Metro since February 1934, but you didn't know that—then. Both his name and his face were new to you.

He had played leading roles in only five films. The first two, "Society Doctor" and "Times Square Lady," had been minor productions, which you had probably skipped. The fifth, "Small Town Girl," had not yet been released. You were lucky if you had seen him in two pictures. Those two being "Broadway Melody of 1936" and "Magnificent Obsession."

You knew very little about him. You did not know who he was, what he was like, where he had come from, what he had done to arrive on the screen. One year ago. He was not yet a star. His name had not yet been billed above the title of any picture.

Metro had had a hunch that in young Taylor it might have a future star after a lengthy build-up. But, in young Taylor, the studio was discovering, it did have a sensation, such a sensation as no studio had ever had before.

It was incredible. Impossible. Why, people hadn't had time to become this excited about him! He hadn't made enough pictures! He hadn't done anything sensational enough! There hadn't even been any publicity campaign about him!

Yet, letters in a white avalanche, bearing every postmark in the United States, were descending upon Hollywood, addressed to Robert Taylor. His two latest pictures were sell-outs, playing to hold-over business. Every magazine in the country was trying to get Taylor coverage. Newspaper columnists were calling him the biggest Hollywood news of a generation. Feminine stars were pleading to have him as their leading man. A girl couldn't appear with him at a social function without finding herself in newspaper headlines. He couldn't appear in public, himself, without being stampeded.

Things like these were incredible, impossible, but—they certainly were happening. Hollywood was witnessing a phenomenon that passed all understanding. Before a studio could tell the public that here was a great new star, the public was telling the studio!

And not the least amazed person in Hollywood was Robert Taylor.

One year ago, interviewers found him a young man honestly puzzled by the furore that was then beginning, frankly excited by his "luck," amazed at his loss of privacy, annoyed by his being a target for a succession of romance rumors.

Interviewers found him completely, surprisingly normal, even distressingly normal. He wasn't what the ink-stained brethren and sisters of the Press would call "good copy."

He had no dramatic story to tell. He came from an average American family, in an average American town, and, up to now, had apparently lived an average American life. He had had no colorful adventures, no out-of-the-ordinary experiences. The writers didn't sense how that very fact would endear him even more to the American public. The writers faintly resented his failure to make up a few melodramatic, startling incidents, for sweet sensation's sake.

With interviewers, he didn't "give." He didn't open up and talk about himself, without being asked. He waited for questions. And then his answers were in sentences, not paragraphs.

In person, he was as good-looking as the camera said he was—with blue eyes, brown hair, a ready smile. He was friendly, but without stressing the point. He was quiet. He was self-possessed, but he (Continued on page 74)

The Taylor-Harlow torrid love scenes for "Personal Property" were all in the day's work, but the rumor hounds didn't want to believe that!

Barbara Stanwyck isn't the most beautiful girl in Hollywood, nor the youngest, but she's Bob's adored among women.

It's simple to make a go of it—if you know how

By Kay Proctor

Ann works in Hollywood; Hubby Roger Pryor, in Chicago; so when she visits him, he meets her at the station with his band.

IMAGINE A husband who (1) never criticizes your clothes; (2) never squawks about bills; (3) never argues about anything; and (4) always meets you at the train with a band!

Ann Sothern is actually married to such a paragon of virtues, Roger Pryor. She openly admitted as much.

But cheer up. She also admitted it is barely possible this Utopian state of affairs exists because she has only seen Roger an accurate total of six weeks and three days, and that split into three visits, since she married him last September! Roger, you know, has to live in Chicago because a contract to lead his band at the College Inn every night keeps him there. And Ann's fat little movie contract makes living in Hollywood mandatory for her.

At that, the whole topsy-turvy marital arrangement is quite in keeping with the way their life as Mr. and Mrs. Roger Pryor began. Remember her wedding? Quaint is one word for it, unique another, and just plain dizzy, a third. There was a church ceremony and a crowd and veils, bridesmaids and the works—at exactly one minute after midnight! Seems they had overlooked one technicality of California's three-days-after-the-license law, and that was the first moment they could be wed legally, and still make it to Chicago in time for Roger to open up his doing business as usual at the Inn.

Surface explanations of this four-star husband and unclouded bliss are quite simple, to hear Ann blithely tell it. First, about the non-criticism of clothes.

"When I dash back to visit Roger for a few days, it's more like a honeymoon than staid married life, and whoever heard of a husband criticizing clothes on a honeymoon, unless it was something some other woman wore and, in comparison (smartly enough!), with the perfection of you? Besides, we're so darned glad to see each other, we never notice clothes. Besides, they're usually new and he hasn't got the bill for them yet!"

Mmmmm. Maybe Roger doesn't notice. If so, I'd like to ask Ann why she gave a certain tailor a sound scolding for a tiny wrinkle under the arm of the new suit he brought her the night before she left for her present visit with Roger, and ended with, "Roger will have ten fits when he sees it." Just a point in passing.

That brings us to the bills.

"It's very simple," Ann said succinctly. "I just stick 'em

MARRIAGE

—and Ann Sothern lets you in on the secret

A midnight wedding, with all the trimmings. Then they parted. But some day, Ann hopes, they'll be together "for keeps."

in an envelope—the bills—and mail 'em to Chicago. Roger hates to write letters, so he just never gets around to squawking about 'em. Then, by the time I see him again, he's forgotten about 'em. Isn't that simple?"

Simple indeed. But it might not be so except for the fact that when they were married, Roger insisted there would be none of this modern fifty-fifty business about bills in his household. He would pay them all, and gladly. (Ann held out on paying for her personal maid out of her own purse.) Everything she earned from her work was to go in a trust fund for her. Which it has.

Point Three. Arguments.

How in heck can there be any arguments? It takes two to make one, and two in the same place. Roger is in Chicago. Ann is in Hollywood. Q.E.D. How can there be an argument?

They did have one lulu, Ann confessed. About a famous male star. It darned near broke the week's budget.

"Roger telephoned one night, as he does quite frequently," Ann related. "We chatted about this and that and he asked what I had been doing, what pictures I had seen, and so forth. I mentioned I had seen a certain picture and was crazy about it and the star's work."

Roger, it seems, had seen the picture, too, and took the opposite view. First thing they knew, they were at it hammer and tongs. He was good, he wasn't good, he was an actor, he wasn't an actor.

"Suddenly I realized we were getting nowhere fast, and it was costing us exactly a dollar a minute to get there!" Ann said. "All in all, we argued some $11.40 worth. It's the last time that happened. Now we say, 'Save it for a letter,' and as I said, neither of us likes to write, so it's too much work to argue."

At that, Ann added, it was less costly than similar arguments of married couples on their way home from a picture show. It did not have time to get too personal and end up in recriminations, angry words, hurt feelings, and a good old row that had a three-day hangover! You probably know the kind she means.

Finally, that meeting at trains with bands.

Every time Ann steps foot in Chicago, either by train or plane, Roger has a band lined up to meet her. How many wives can claim husbands that glad to see them?

"Of course, if you want to get technical about it, the band is Roger's own. Furthermore, they're not playing any instruments. Every time so far they've been standing with their collars turned up and their hands in their pockets, shivering in the cold," (Continued on page 83)

Cary talks about marriage, too.

MAN

I WANT to do a case history of a man-about-town," I told Cary Grant. "I want to know what he does and what he doesn't do, what he likes and what he doesn't like, his prejudices and predilections where 'wimmin' are concerned, the why, the wherefore and the whence. Meaning, in a word, you!"

"Me, a man-about-town?" laughed Cary, his bright, bold eyes derisive, "why me? I'm not a man-about-town. Sounds like a page of fashions. I'm not, certainly, the peg upon which to hang 'what the well-dressed man-about-town will wear,' that's a cinch. When we made 'When You're in Love' over at Columbia, they wanted me to look kind of sloppy and casual. I had to dress, or rather not dress up, for the part. They couldn't even make me clothes that looked careless and unpressed enough. So I had to wear my own!

"Nope, man-about-town-and-country might be more like it. And mostly country. I hate to say this, it's gray-bearded with age and much repetition, but I spend most of my spare time swimming, reading, taking those well-known long drives in my car—alone.

"Randy Scott and I still have our same place at the beach, you know. Randy's wife didn't come between this pair of friends. On the contrary. Remarkable institution, women," said Cary.

"Let's dispose of the 'wimmin' first," I suggested. "I've heard that you don't hand us very much."

"A man-about-town not handing orchids to the lady?" grinned Cary. "What kind of a monstrosity would that be? It's nonsense, anyway. Of course I like women. I can't stand some of the things some of them do. I can't stand them when they talk baby talk, use red nail polish, have gooey lips. But that's fair enough. They probably can't stand some of the things I do, either.

-ABOUT-TOWN

"I can't go for the kind of girl who, when you call her and say, 'What are you doing Sunday night?', comes right back at you with, 'Nothing, I'd love it. What shall I wear? What time do we meet at the Troc'?'

"'Love what?' you find yourself asking and who the heck said anything about the Troc'? I'd probably had some such place as Dopey Dan's for hamburgers vaguely in mind or a drive along the beach.

"I can't stand women who talk baby talk. I like women who speak my language and it may be pidgin English or pig Latin, but it's not baby talk. I can't stand that red nail polish. I like a little lipstick when it isn't the gooey kind. We're so conditioned to lipstick by now that if I met a girl with naked lips I'd probably take her for Camille.

"One thing a man-about-town should know about women is that they do not dress for men. They should, but they don't. If they did they'd abolish those gawd-awful red nails. They must know by this time that the stuff is repellent to men. Yet they keep right on using it. Women dress for women, I've found that out. The idea, it seems, is to be the best-dressed, smartest gal, and therefore the most talked about.

"Men have more fun than women do, I'll wager that. There's none of that competition stuff. Go to a men's club and no one knows or cares what you are wearing. You can wear old dungarees and a pair of boots if you feel like it and no one would notice it.

"I like smart women. I like tailored women when they are the tailored type. I like the fluffy, feminine women when they are the ruffly type. I like a little make-up, cleverly used, so cleverly that I wouldn't notice it. I do not like such barbarisms as false eyelashes, those tweezed eyebrows and other atrocities of a similar nature.

"I like professional women better than non-professionals. You can talk to them and they can talk to you. They are alert and have a sense of humor. You know that they won't faint at the sight of a mouse or twist your words to suit their own purposes. They're swell."

"Would you," I interrupted, "marry a professional woman—from choice?"

"Sure I would," said Cary, "if I were contemplating matrimony—and I'm not. I'd marry a star, an extra girl, a lady medico, if I fell in love with her. I'm not afraid of women who know more than I do. I would not feel any resentment toward a woman who was a ranking star even if I had not attained the same rank myself. I'd be proud of her as I'd hope she would be proud of me if the situation were reversed.

"Really this man-about-town idea is columnist-conceived. I am reported as being seen at the Troc', the Vendome or wherever; actually I go to these places very seldom.

"What really happens is this: The columnists have to fill their columns with cinema chatter. It's safer to fill the columns with single men and their activities, real or fancied, than it is to mention married men, with possible complications. It seems there is a scarcity of single males here in Hollywood. Thus does the name of Grant come in for such generous social repetition.

"I've been amused, more than once, to read an account of a party of six or eight given, let's say, at a popular night club. I may not have been out for six weeks; possibly, I may have been at that particular party. In either case I'm liable to read, 'Report hath it that Cary Grant brought Miss So-and-So.' Now I have probably never met Miss So-and-So and almost certainly did not have the pleasure of 'bringing her.' But I was the only single man present. She was the only single girl. So I was the 'bloke wot brung her.'"

All this time, Cary had been lounging lazily, talking casually, even flippantly

SIMONE SIMON DEFENDS HERSELF—AND HOW!

By Gladys Hall

She admits she's walked off the set, slapped a director, disobeyed an executive—but there were reasons

When strangers say, "Hello, sweetheart," Simone has an answer—and it isn't "Hi, Darling," you may be sure!

THAT SIMONE Simon, "they" say, here in Hollywood. She is a one! She is temperamental, unpredictable, unreasonable—a rebel and a spoiled little so-and-so. "They" shake their collective heads over her. They sigh, they shrug, but they talk about her.

She is seen out, dancing with this lad and that. There are rumors that she is in love with Jimmy Stewart and that it is madly mutual—or that it is unrequited. It is said, too, that she is in love with Jimmy's friend, John Swope. She is seen with William Wyler and Rouben Mamoulian. "They" say, additionally, that she plays ping-pong with Hollywood hearts while her own is somewhere in France.

Born in Marseilles, raised in Madagascar, where the wild strains and races of the world meet and mingle, their untamed spirits infused the very air the child breathed.

Simone is an untamed spirit! Convention has never shackled her. Love has never broken her. Pain has not subdued her. She is, still, a child of Madagascar.

They tell how she walked off the set of "White Hunter" and "Under Two Flags." Hollywood will never quite get over that. She claimed it was flu. "They" said, "a fluke, more-like." Hospitalization for weeks failed to convince them. For how dared she, a new-comer to Hollywood? She should have, according to all precedent, bent a servile knee to the studio.

BUT THERE isn't a salaam in all the savagely sweet spirit of Simone, nor yet a kow-tow. She uses honey when she feels like it and bitter gall when she feels bitter. Nor does she know obedience to anything save to her own emotions, which are honest and unblunted.

"They" say that she is apt to slap the face of anyone who offends her. It is known how she slapped the face of Tourjansky, famed Russian director who, espying her in front of a Paris cafe one evening, rushed up to her and exclaimed, "You are just the person I have been seeking." Swift as an adder strikes, struck the small hand of Simone. It was that slap which brought her, eventually, to Hollywood.

Yes, inexplicable to Hollywood are the wild and willful ways of Simone. But the French are a practical people.

Simone declares she loved to work with James Stewart in "Seventh Heaven" and the picture above tends to prove her statement.

However unreasonable they appear, they usually have good reasons for it. I determined to third-degree Simone.

I found her finishing the laying out of a badminton court in her garden in Beverly Hills. Simone and her secretary had done the work all themselves. She perched on a stone wall, while I faced her down, or up.

I said, "I'll begin at random. . . . What about the time Ernie Westmore, the make-up man, gave you the critical survey? I am told that he suggested that your hair be done differently and that your lips be made up differently. What of it? That is his job. That is what every newcomer goes through when first she comes to Hollywood. Yet you stormed out of the beauty chair, hurling defiance at poor Mr. Westmore?"

Simone laughed, "Oh, that," she said, in her English, which has so vastly improved since I talked with her six months ago, yet still bears the aroma of the French accent. "I didn't understand. He looked at me like this. He seemed not to like me at all. He wanted to make me all different. I did not understand how the personal also could be impersonal. And so I stormed out of there and said rich things to him to tell him I did not like him, either. Now I know what he was meaning and we are friends. That is very simple."

"But," I said, "there was the time when you were introduced to a worthy and dignified member of the Associated Press. You stared at him for a long time. Then you said, 'I do not think I like you.' What for?"

I DID not think I liked him, that is all for that," said Simone blandly. "It seemed better to say so and have no mistake about it. Later, I changed my mind. He is at luncheon with me and others. I watch him and then I tell him that I think I can grow to like him."

"I have heard electricians, property men, and waitresses say that you acted highty-tighty and offended when they spoke to you," I pursued. "Have you a reason for that?"

"But certainly," said Simone. "When I first come over here I go on the set or into a beauty parlor and people I have never seen before, people who do not know whether they like me or detest me say, 'Hello, sweetheart,' or 'Good morning, darling.' I do not say (Continued on page 81)

HOLLYWOOD S(n)OB

The young woman with Doug is Mrs. Fairbanks, to be sure, but the point is she was—Lady Ashley.

SOCIAL REGISTER

Here we have Al. Al who? Vanderbilt, of course! With Ginger Rogers.

By Helen Louise Walker

WELL, IT'S been like this ever since the races started at Santa Anita. At a recent cocktail party a young man was in earnest conversation about his day at the track. "And I said to Al, I said, 'Al' . . ." He paused and gave me a little nudge. "Al Vanderbilt, I mean," he said, gently. "You know, Al, of course?" I had to admit that I had not met Al.

The young man looked so horrified that I thought that I had better say something, so I volunteered, brightly, "I've met Robert Taylor." He brushed this aside.

"Who hasn't?" he said, witheringly, and turned again to my neighbor. "I said, 'Al, old boy, I think you're wrong about that horse!' And d'you know what Al said?"

But I didn't feel neglected because on the other side of me a voice was saying, "I was telling dear Sylvia . . . Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks, you know. She was Lady Ashley. I said, 'Sylvia . . . ' "

I began to feel pretty elegant myself, because here I was simply surrounded by people who called millionaires and people who once had titles by their first names—even by their pet names. It occurred to me, though, to wonder how Doug Fairbanks felt about it all. His latest wife must have been mentioned in the public prints about twenty thousand times since their marriage, but never once have I seen a reference without the parenthetical addition, "Mrs. Fairbanks is the former Lady Sylvia Ashley." Certainly no one in Hollywood ever fails to mention that fact when he speaks of her and I just wondered how Doug felt to have it made so emphatic about who his wife was before she became who she is, because who she is might seem important to a lot of people, including Doug.

There is no doubt about it. Hollywood is growing grander every day. There are no longer big parties with ropes of gardenias and four orchestras and magnums of champagne. Those are "vulgar." People now sit in dimly lit rooms and listen to chamber music and readings from Fourteenth Century Italian poets. Honestly they do!

Joan Blondell doesn't think it's too early to look toward young Norman Barnes' future.

Joan Blondell passes on some wise do's and dont's for making a young man happy

. . WHAT I'LL

Mr. and Mrs. Dick Powell certainly have the happiness formula down pat.

Fernand Gravet, the Frenchman who has all the girls ga-ga, with Joan in a scene from "The King and the Chorus Girl."

TELL MY SON

By

JOAN BLONDELL

as told to

Ben Maddox

WHAT WILL Joan Blondell tell her son? She intends to pass on to him what she herself has learned about this perplexing world of ours. And Joan admits this is plenty!

Today, acclaimed the most charming of comediennes, she is happy again as Mrs. Dick Powell. She is busy combining a new picture with settling down in her new house. Yet, Joan isn't for a second forgetting her son by her first marriage. Tiny Norman Barnes, two years old, is very much in her heart, too.

"I expect women to make or break his life," she declared suddenly, between merry quips. "Not myself among them—I don't expect to be the dominating woman in his life. I mean the women he'll meet when he's old enough to fall in love.

"I am anxious to put him wise to a lot of vital facts I have discovered. I'll try to show him how to get along with girls. I shall advise him to test the one he loves, thoroughly. I'll explain how to do this. Certainly I'll assure him that love is terribly important, because I know it is.

"I shall caution him against love at first sight and confide why a long engagement is smart. Of course, I'll attempt to point out all the mistakes which can trip him up, but I won't hold him back if he falls madly in love too young. Not even if I see she's the wrong type and it won't last!"

It was peacefully quiet in the drawing-room of the Dick Powells and Joan's earnestness was in such marked contrast to her usual jollying.

"This may surprise you," she said to me, a blonde vision in pink lounging pajamas, turned completely serious and sincere. "There's one spot he may find himself in when I'll counsel him to be perhaps painfully frank. If he has been going with a girl for quite a while and marriage is just around the corner, he may find that she isn't what he truly wants in a wife after all. Then he should be honest; he should call it off. Yes, even though he's taken up, as she may swear, 'the best years of my life!' In the long run it's the kindest action, for they'd both be miserable if he had any doubts. It's better for him to break her heart to bits quickly. This tragedy won't ruin her, even though she may carry on as though it will. Gradually she'll realize that, anyway, her face is more intriguing because of what she's gone through; she's lost weight suffering—but it's nice to be thinner!

I SHALL advise Norman not to marry young; it's silly for a man to do so. He ought to wait until he's at least thirty. For when he's younger all he'll care about is how keen a dancer she is and what lovely eyelashes she has. His whole viewpoint will change as he matures. Eventually, he'll want a woman who'll be a fine mother and home-maker.

"Pick your girl, I'll say, not for her beauty, or her neatness, or because she's polite in company; but for some inner quality in her that moves you deeply, some mysterious quality that makes you sure she is above and beyond ordinary women.

"Don't let the life-of-the-party bowl you over; she can't be vivacious every night at home, after she's yours. Remember, also, that if she's so physical in her appeal, she knows how to be that way towards all the other fellows, too.

"A long engagement—a year's what I call long—is most advisable because it'll give you a chance to be positive she'll handle situations as you'd want your wife to. It'll allow you to check on what she is like, fundamentally. Perhaps traits will blossom (Continued on page 85)

BEAUTY FROM ALL

Of course, Sonja Henie is the perfect example of body grace. Imitate her, if you would acquire good posture.

ANGLES

By Mary Marshall

Deanna Durbin is, admittedly, a lovely-looking girl. But how does she manage to look pretty even when she sings?

All actresses have the problem of managing difficult costumes in pictures, and Barbara Stanwyck's figure adapts itself to them easily. Truthfully, would yours?

PEOPLE ARE going to judge you and me by appearances and that's all there is to it. It may be unjust when a girl is as bright as a button that she be set down as unattractive simply because her appearance isn't bright as a button, too, but there you are. You may have a warm 'eart, a tasty wit, a sunny disposish, and a dozen other mental and spiritual assets, but a few physical liabilities can send your stock down in 1929 fashion.

Most of us have a tendency to assume if we look okay flat view to ourselves in the mirror, that everything's dandy. Most of us who are as active and busy as we should be are inclined to make up and dress in a hurry. And most of us who are as interested as we want to be in what's going on around us can't be eternally thinking about how we look.

Few of us can afford personal maids to see to it that the back of our hair looks as nice as the front. We must attend to such matters ourselves. And how are we going to attend to the smaller niceties of good grooming—so that we'll be as beautiful as possible from every angle—without taking all day about it?

Having mentioned the back hair, let me tackle that point first. I see so many hair-dos which are darling in front and dreadful behind. So here are some rules for the back of your head, and don't forget 'em!

THE REGULAR haircut mustn't be neglected. It mustn't be put off. Save the money for a trip to the barber as carefully as you save money for the rent. You can shampoo your own hair, you can wave and curl it if need be, you can manicure your own nails—but you can't cut your own hair. Be fussy about your haircuts, and when you find an operator or a barber who does it to suit you, stick to him, or her.

I wish every gal in the world would take a firm stand against shaving the back of the neck. This isn't as prevalent as it used to be, thanks to the long bobs, but the ladies whose hair grows far down on the back of their necks still feel that the coiffure must be finished off with the electric razor. And, in time, the nape of the neck, which should be soft and white and feminine, is about as alluring as Uncle Ezra's three-day-old beard. Wear a longer bob, or go long-hair entirely, if you have this problem to cope with.

Please stop being dictated to by fashions in hairdress! I've said before and I say it again that elaborate ways of fixing the hair are only for those who have plenty of money and plenty of time to fuss and fiddle. The hair-do that combines the maximum of ease and becomingness for you is the hair-do you should adopt.

TAKE ADVANTAGE of the hair gadgets on the toilet goods counter of every five-and-dime store in the country. Turn the back hair up on the roller whosits, to keep the permanent wave in trim. Turn the little wisps and ends round into flat curls, first moistening them with waving lotion, and pin them in place to dry with two invisible pins. It's a bit of trouble when you want to pop into bed in a hurry, but you'll feel a lot happier next morning.

Don't neglect the crown of your head—that spot where the part in the hair usually stops. The hair should be smooth and shining from there on down to the ends—all-of-a-piece, fitting the head like a cap. It usually looks kinda ratty and ill-tended, instead. Comb it down smoothly. Brush it for extra gloss. And the merest touch of brilliantine, applied with the palm of your hand or your hairbrush, will keep it looking nice.

And do you know that rubbing your hair with a piece of velvet does wonders for the sheen of the topknot? Well, it does. Just take a swatch of the cloth and smooth down over the part of your hair which you wear straight—from the part out, or from the crown down to the ends. I'm told this is a trick of the beautiful Spanish women, who wear their black hair parted in the middle and slicked severely down and back into a knot. It's a good stunt, whether the tale is true or not.

The fancy fashion magazines say that hats are comin' down further over the backs of our heads. If this isn't a Parisian false alarm, my pets, we'll all have to go in for less of the clusters of curls and finger-rolls and wear our hair plainer. A good thing, too, I say. Think it over and make your hair-plans accordingly.

ENOUGH ABOUT hair. Here's something about backs, another difficult beauty angle. Summer isn't so far away and I want all your backs to be nice and smooth and free from blemishes. The first essential in back beauty is getting it darn good and clean. Buy yourselves a back brush. I have two. And would you like to know what I do with the spare? I cold cream my back with it. I smear it good and plenty with cold cream and anoint the spinal column. Then I give it a scrubbing with soap and water. Backs are such easy prey to blackheads and it is hard to get 'em clean without the aid of a brush. Lacking a brush, however, a small turkish towel, generously lathered with mild soap and seesawed vigorously back and forth, will serve well enough. This back-cleansing, incidentally, makes you feel simply swell. But do remember to dry as thoroughly as you scrub, so that the skin won't get chapped and scaly.

Harry, Al and Jimmy, acting slightly mad, as usual.

Putting on the Ritz very often means stealing the show.

The Ritz Brothers don't make much sense

By Karen Hollis

(Top to bottom) Those "horror" men—Lorre, Laughton and Karloff? No! Al, Harry and Jimmy.

These boys know how to make you laugh and ring the box-office bell, too.

Another bit from "On the Avenue." You can be sure that not a single aching heart lurks behind their grins, either.

They've decided not to be starred because it's more fun to steal pictures from the name-in-lights gentry.

JIMMY DURANTE was pounding the piano in a honky-tonk in Coney Island, and a slick-haired, eel-like kid named George Raft was kicking out a terrific Black Bottom, when three guys who had been hanging around the joint for three weeks asked for a tryout of an act they'd worked up. (Your vocabulary wouldn't be so good either after half an hour with the Ritz Brothers.)

For weeks these guys had kept the customers laughing. They'd jump to their feet between floor shows and put on crazy stunts, and then pay their checks like gentlemen. Or anyway, pay their checks. And here they wanted to spoil it all by expecting pay for their clowning.

The manager hoped they'd be terrible when they put on a rehearsed routine. Maybe then they'd be sensible about coming back just to play around. They enjoyed it, didn't they?

But the act was not terrible. Decidedly not. It was the Ritz Brothers, those frenzied lunatics who are the current box-office darlings, from Broadway to the farthest crossroads.

Dressed in bell-bottomed trousers, flowing ties, and gob hats, copied from the cartoon-strip, Harold Teen, they travestied collegians in that first tryout. With a fury that shook the halls of higher learning for miles around, they danced and sang with such hilarious results that Earl Carroll came over and signed them for a Broadway show. Other shows followed, then vaudeville, and after a lot of ups and downs, 20th Century-Fox Pictures grabbed them.

YEAH, HONEY," cooed Jim Ritz, who, with his cyclonic brother, Harry, was piecing together the crazy-quilt of their career for me, "every time you think you're getting somewhere in show business, there's a long layoff and you're back where you started—in night clubs. Maybe in cleaner ones, but night clubs just the same."

Ritz has always suggested caviar and cordials, sables

The trio, in one of their more peaceful moods.

and probably you won't either after reading about this goofy trio and snobbery. Not any more. Nowadays putting on the Ritz means stealing a picture. Ritz stands for whirlwind action, belly laughs, and standing room only. The Ritz Brothers ran up a record by making three pictures in five months, "Sing, Baby, Sing," "One in a Million," and "On the Avenue." When the third came out, exhibitors were still playing return engagements on the first one, and somebody even brought out a short they had made five years before.

"They wouldn't even release it then," said Jim, just the type to hang crepe on a flagpole. "Thought the public wasn't educated down to our level."

In person, the boys look like guileless, prosperous young business men, not the high-speed, wild-eyed maniacs they play on the screen.

The Ritz Brothers did not take their name from the elegant hotels of that name. They got it off a laundry in Brooklyn. Al Joachim, eldest of the brothers was loitering down the street wishing something would happen. Times were so tough at home that something had to happen at once to put him in touch with a few dollars. Something did happen. A man came rushing out of the Vitagraph Studios and hired everyone in sight for extra work.

When Al gave his name for the payroll, the assistant director told him he'd better pick one with more class. So, seeing "Ritz Laundry" in big electric lights across the street, he picked that. He kinda liked the idea of seeing his name in lights already.

At home, his kid brothers decided they liked the name of Ritz, too, but they didn't get around to using it for some time.

AL WAS working every now and then in a dance act with two girls. Jim struggled through eighth grade (and there is no humor in the intent way that he assures you it was a struggle) and got a job as shipping clerk. Harry, the youngest, was the "intellectual" type. He intended to get through high school if it took him eighty years, and it began to look as if it would. Try as he would, he could not remember where he had mislaid Afghanistan, or what X equalled, and the frantic expression on his face made the classroom guffaw.

One day a school teacher of the ample, motherly type sent for Papa Joachim and Harry to come to her office.

"Take him out of school," she begged. "He'll never learn anything here, and neither will anyone else as long as he is around. He even makes me laugh all the time. He belongs on the stage."

Harry's feelings were hurt by the suggestion that he couldn't learn anything, but he couldn't stop to brood over it. He had to work fast to keep Pop from getting the idea he was being kicked out of school.

"See Pop, she says I could make money on the stage." So Pop gave in.

Very soon Jim got fired from his job as shipping clerk. Too much clowning. He didn't fancy facing Pop on Saturday night without a pay envelope, so he decided to enter an amateur night contest at the local theatre.

"Were you any good?" I asked him.

"Pretty good, darling," Jim admitted. "I could dance."

"Among the winners?"

"Uh-huh."

"Third—second—first?" I persisted, as Jim's mellow, collie-like eyes pleaded with big, substantial Harry to rescue him.

"First," Jim blurted out with an air of you-made-me-tell-it.

Something in Jim's intense manner made me suspect that he had leanings toward playing a romantic part.

"Yeah," he admitted, and for the first time he looked as he does on the screen, a little wild-eyed, his nose wrinkled as if he smelled a whiff of rare old Limburger.

I GET a yen sometimes to play the big sentimental stuff. They let me do it once, too, gave me a little scene with Alice Faye in 'Sing, Baby, Sing.' While we were doing it, I thought it was swell. But when it was run off in the projection room, Darryl Zanuck almost had to be carried out. I guess it was funny all right. But I forget easily. I'll probably get a

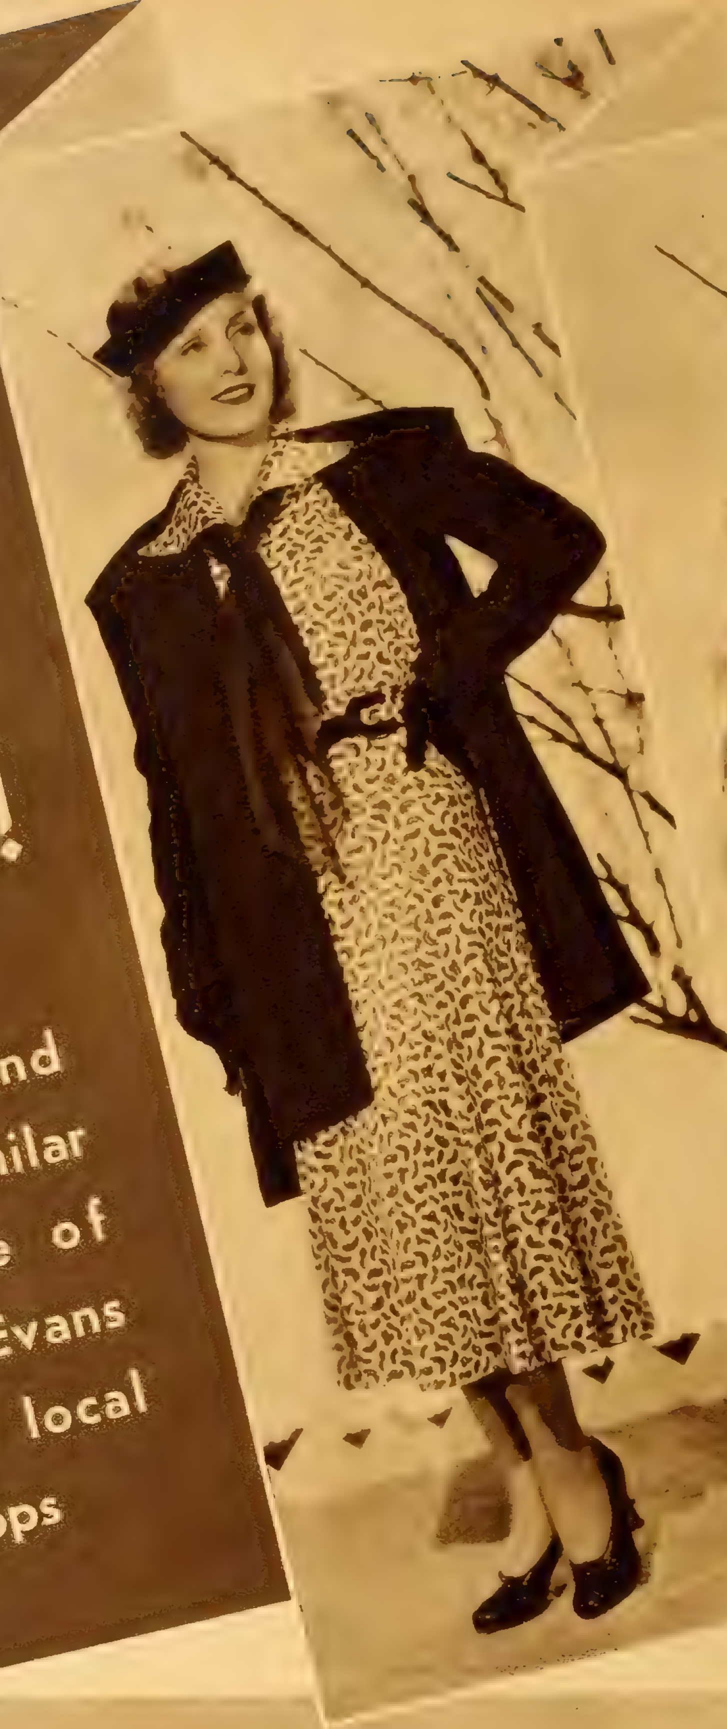
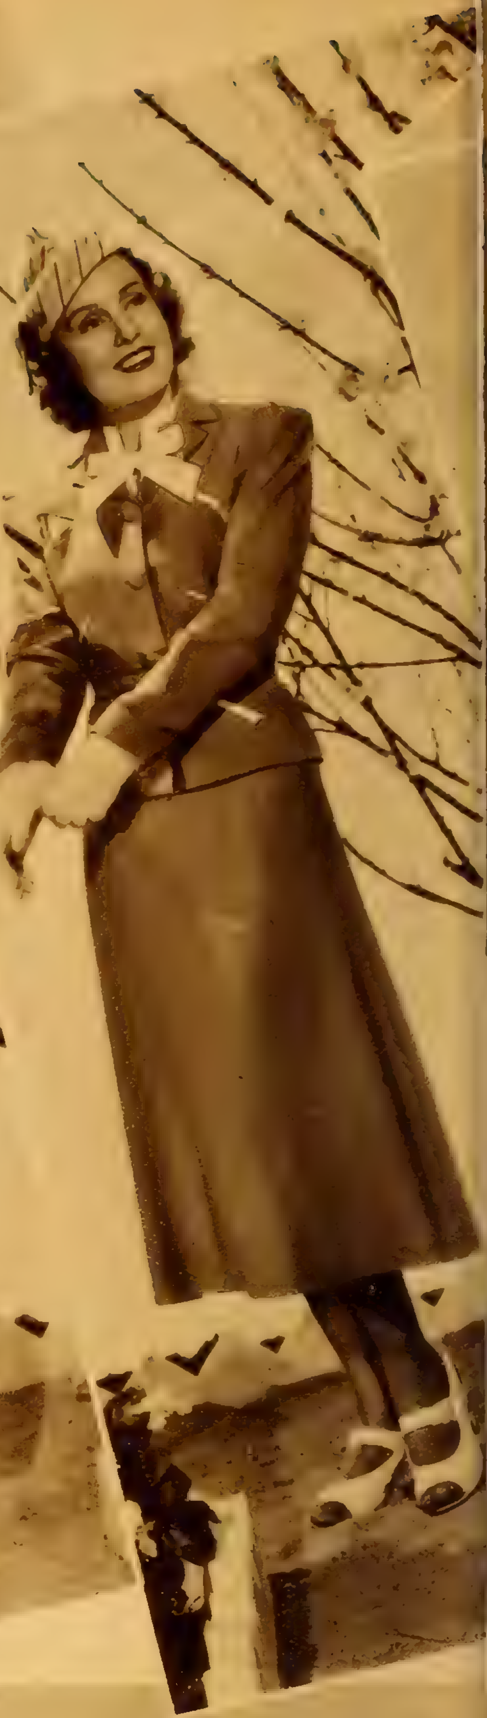
TO WEAR RIGHT NOW!

You can find clothes similar to these of Madge Evans in your local shops



Madge Evans' printed ensemble consists of a jersey sports dress and navy coat.

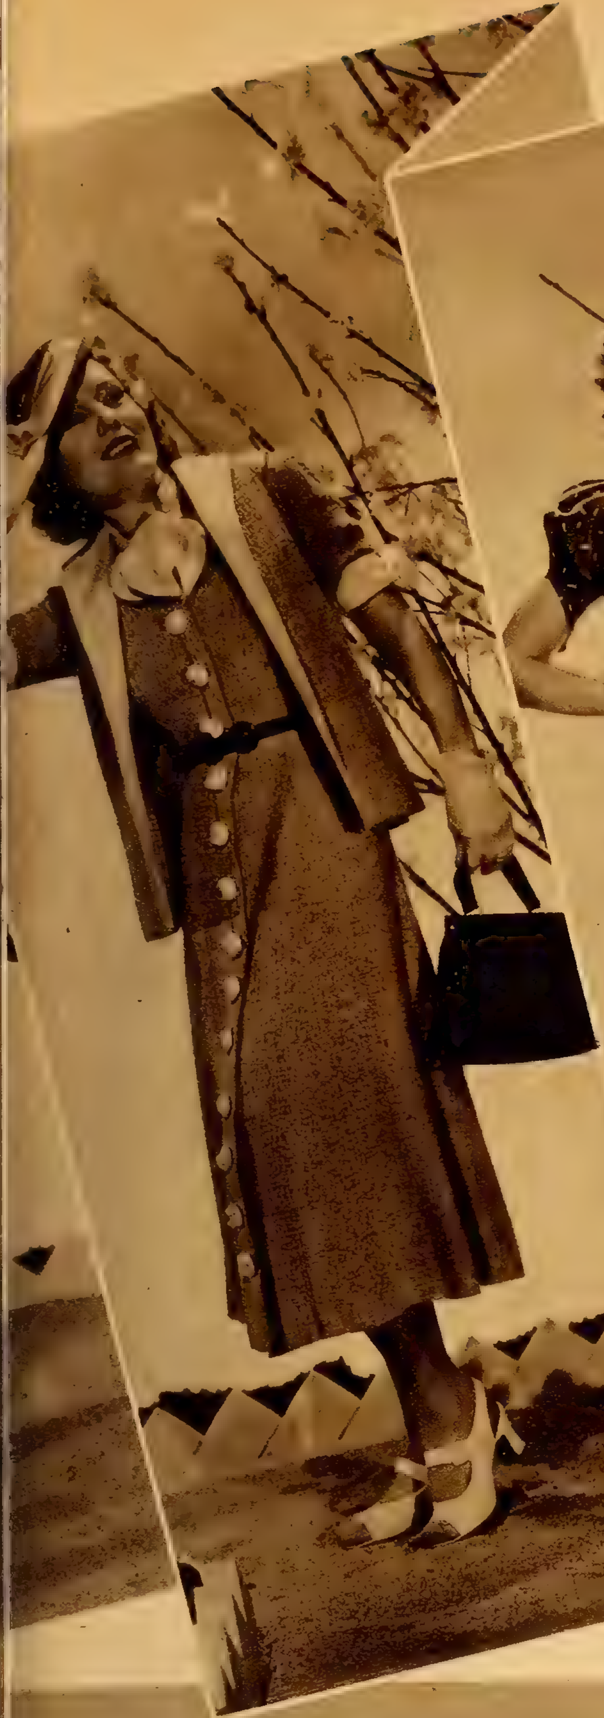


Beige is the color of this light-weight woolen suit, with pique trim.

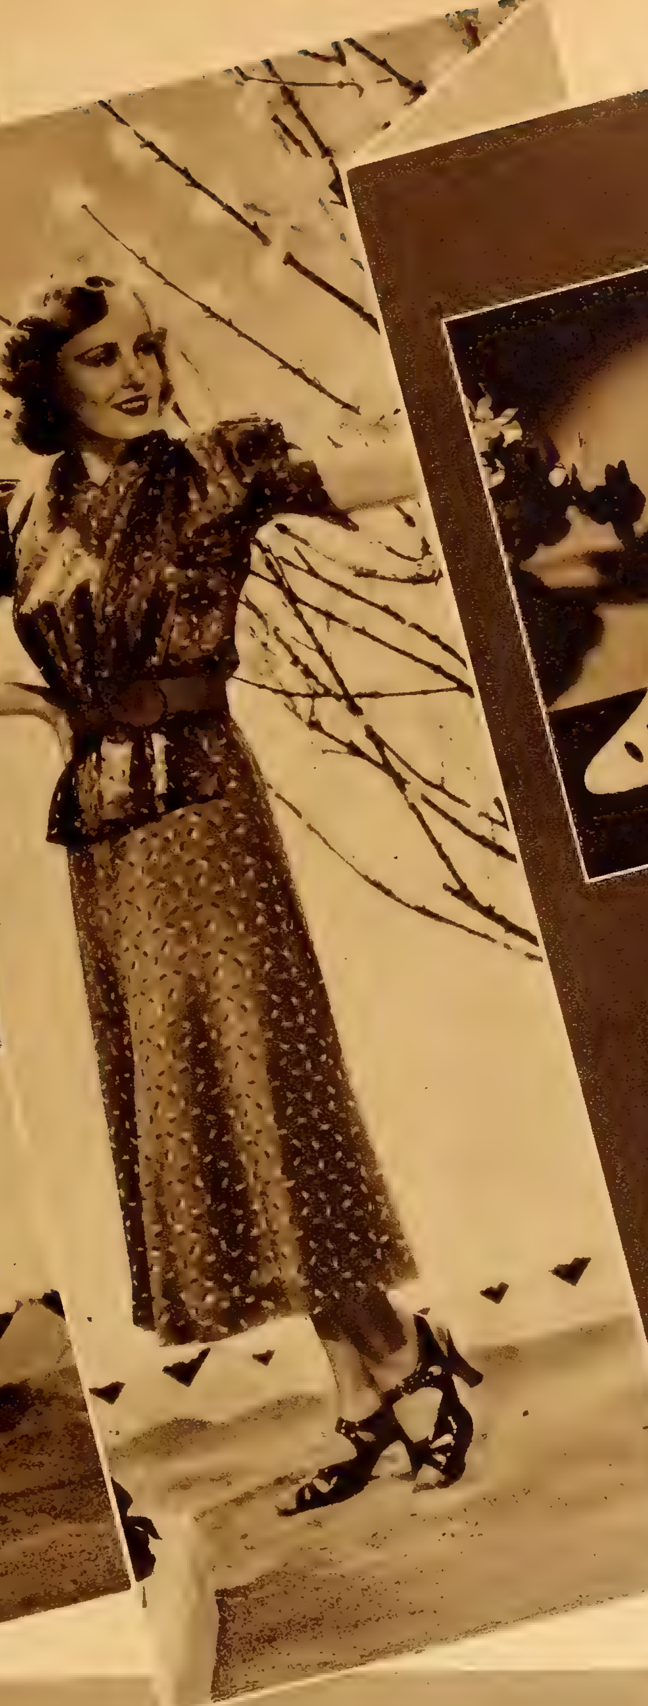
I DON'T believe that Madge Evans ever has been named among "the ten best-dressed" Hollywood stars, yet she is outstanding for her excellent taste and perfect grooming. Season in and season out, Madge wears clothes that are practical for you and me. They're conservative clothes, but never dull or uninteresting.

Madge told me once that she had decided what sort of thing suited her best and that no fads or whims of the current fashion picture could induce her to wear anything that she didn't feel right in. For instance, she's adamant on the subject of color. Blue is, to her mind, the most flattering shade she can wear. So, winter or summer, she manages to have shades of blue dominate her wardrobe. She said that she always has navy accessories as the basis for her ensembling and then she selects new clothes to harmonize with them. As a result, she dresses economically because she's not always adding a new pair of shoes or a handbag to tie up with some color scheme which has captured her passing fancy.

So many of the Hollywood gals have acquired smartness since they became stars—but not Madge. Actually, she was clothes-conscious as a child. If you remember, she used to pose in children's hats which were named for her. She was the Shirley Temple of those days and her clothes were copied as eagerly as Shirley's are today. And there's no doubt that this early fashion background has been an important factor in developing the keen clothes sense Madge possesses now.



A grand week-ender is Miss E.'s apple-green woolen jacket dress. You can copy this easily.



The flared peplum of Madge's printed silk foulard gives it a two-piece effect.

This good-looking white strap slipper, with the popular cut-out detail, is the sort of shoe that is indispensable for summer wear because it ties up so beautifully with cottons, silks and woolens.

By Adelia Bird

I asked her to select four daytime outfits from her closet that would be generally wearable for you and me. She did and the grand thing about her selection is that each one can either be copied by you, who are good with the needle, or styles similar to them may be bought in your own shops right now.

I've discovered that many of you are eager to get patterns of costumes shown each month on these pages. You write in to me asking how to obtain them and I have to write back telling you that they are from the star's personal wardrobe and have not been copied in patterns. I know this is a disappointment to you, but where styles are as simple as most of these are, the real trick is to look through pattern books for something as nearly like the one you want as possible and then add the little individual details of the star's original dress. After all, it is the detailing that makes one dress different from another—that, and the fabric combinations.

I don't want you to think I can't practice what I preach. So, as an example, take Madge's printed ensemble. It is composed of a very simple printed silk jersey sports dress —red and blue figures on a white ground. The sleeves are short and the neckline rather high with a flatteringly wide collar. The most unusual detail of this dress is its blue chiffon scarf, tied casually with the ends reaching to the waistline. It's not a tricky dress at all, but it's extremely smart. Almost any simple sports dress pattern could be used in copying this.

First romance has come to beautiful June Lang, but has it really come to stay?

LOVE AT TWENTY

By James Reid

LOVE IMPORTANT—at twenty?" June Lang's soft voice caressed the question. A smile flickered on her lips, and in her eyes. A smile of amused pity for any unfortunate unbeliever. A smile of secret suspicion that she was being teased.

"I can't think of anything more important," she said.

She, June Lang, a career-girl whose career looked as if it were becoming important, could say this—and mean it?

She could for a number of reasons. There were already visible proofs that she could.

On the way to this luncheon, for example, she had wanted to stop in the publicity office to pick up a photograph, she said. Not that she was in the habit of collecting photographs of herself, she had added. This was an extra-special photograph. It was, it seemed, a photograph of herself in a wedding dress.

Every studio designer in Hollywood had been asked to create a wedding gown for a dazzling, movie-fashion show at the Biltmore. Royer had created a wedding gown. He had used June as his model. Upon the gown's completion, she had been photographed in it. Now she wanted to see what the camera said about her as a bride.

There was no ulterior motive in her curiosity. She wasn't planning an immediate wedding. Not that day, anyway. (Cont'd on page 79)

All the boys want to date June, but there's only one gent who has won his way to her heart.

OFF THEIR GUARD

Frank Muto and his little black box catch up with the movie boys and girls here, there and everywhere, whether they know it or not

GINGER'S SKATING PARTY

Tired of rolling around on her own, Kay Francis tries a new wrinkle in sit-down strikes! And of all places, at Ginger Rogers' party, which was rolled off at Hollywood's Rollerdrome.

Jimmy Stewart prefers Ginger. Guess who Ginger prefers?

Something tickles that Young gal, but Cesar Romero doesn't seem to care, right.

While the music and skaters go 'round and 'round, Jack Oakie and the Missus relax.

And a good time is had by all, especially Hostess Ginger and her guest of honor, Al Vanderbilt.

Something's pretty funny to Jim and Mrs. Henry Fonda, but Henry wants to get set to go places.

What's this? Al's got two gals—Ginger and Joan—while Franchot Tone is left out in the cold.

Jimmy is still rarin' to go, but Andy Devine and his wife have had 'nuff of this foolishness.

Came the dawn—and Tyrone Power greets it before he faces director, cast and camera crew of "Cafe Metropole."

"What have I got to lose?" philosophizes T. P. "Nothing! There's lotsa fun, hard work and mun-yee, too. Wotta break."

GETTIN' SET FOR THE

In his hand a letter from his girl, on the desk a picture of the girl. Who's the girl? Sonja Henie, sillies.

Tyrone's pal thinks he'll meet those bee-ooties on the lot, but is told, "I'll be seein' you here at six o'clock."

A guy's got to look just right when Loretta Young's the girl waiting—on the set.

With an eye on the clock, your friend takes a quick one—a very tall orange juice.

SET

It wouldn't do to "blow up" on his lines, so a last-minute look at the script's in order.

Yes, even full-fledged stars take movie tests for each new picture, so our Joan tries out for "Vogues of 1938." P. S. She got the job.

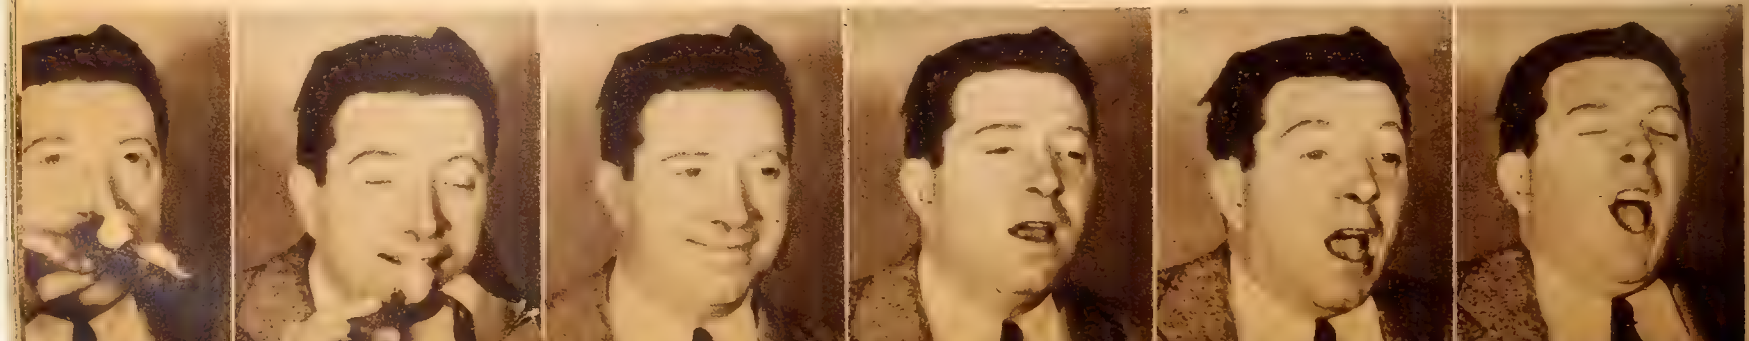
MOVIE TEST

And Joan Bennett's bugaboo is that "what to wear" problem

What the girl really needs is a pair of shoes! Why don't you say eni, meni, mini, mo and let it go at that, Joan?

Well, the problem's solved, for la belle remembers that white's her lucky color. And it didn't let her down this time either!

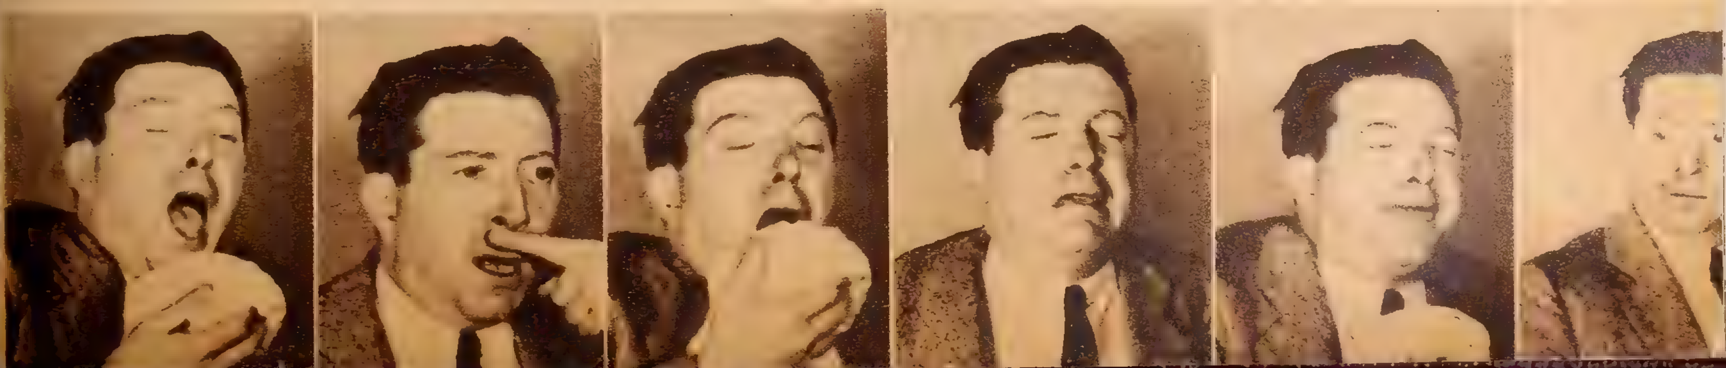
Frank smells a rose not a rat! Little does he suspect that he's the unfortunate victim of the old



Being pinned and tucked for the myriad gowns and costumes that are worn in a picture is enough to try anyone's patience.

Joan calls it a day, at last. Hey, what's that in your hand, m'lady? Oh, a refreshing fruit lemonade!

"pepper in the flower" gag. It's too late now! Our Innocent, Frankie McHugh, is left to his Fate



AT THE MOVIES

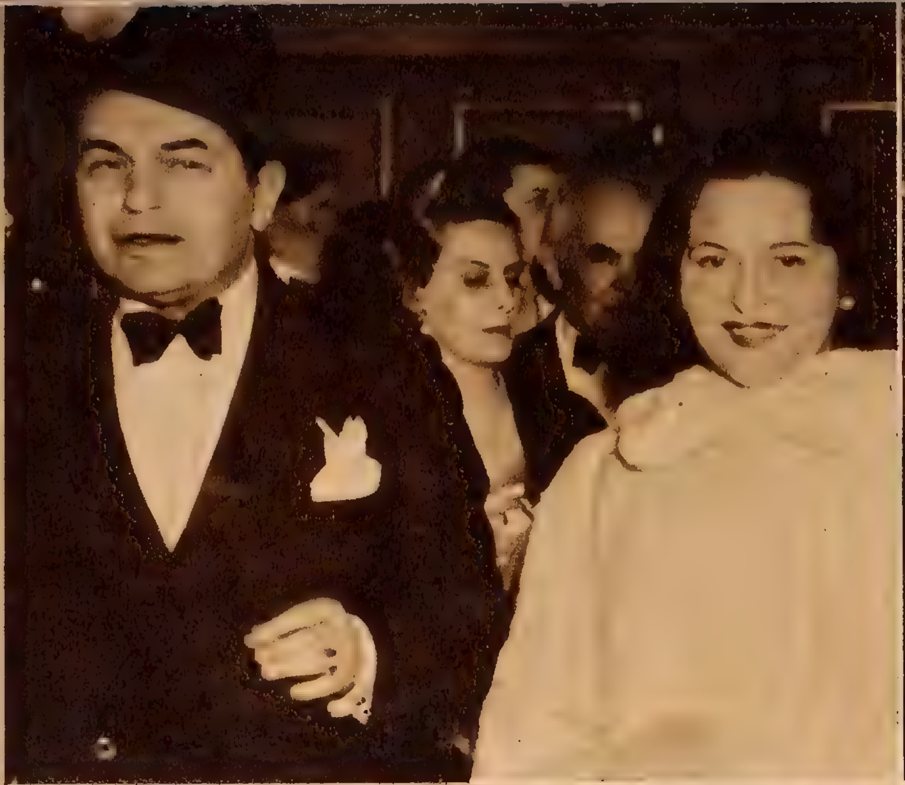
Our snapshooter catches up with John Boles and the Missus, who are having a wonderful time seeing and being seen. It was a gay night all around.

A gala picture premiere is as good an excuse as any for filmdom's beaux and belles to turn out in their best bibs and tuckers. Ginger Rogers was Cary Grant's partner at the "Lost Horizon" opening.

Picture-stealer No. 1, Spencer Tracy, isn't taking any chances. He announces himself and his wife to an eager and waiting public.

Love won out again, for Isabel Jewell and Owen Crump seem to have patched up their differences. Isabel is one of the principals in this Columbia picture, y'know.

Eddie (Kid Galahad) Robinson isn't one for putting on the soup and fish, but Mrs. R. sells him on the idea. Here he is doing the microphone honors, too.



The George O'Briens turn out, too. Mrs. O'B., who was in and out of New York in a hurry when her play closed there, is all decked out in a little mink and ermine number. Pretty smart—eh, wot?

Anna May Wong, and Mr. and Mrs. Doug Fairbanks enjoy the social glitter of the "Lost Horizon" premiere same as the rest of the previewers.

A coupla Carrolls—Madeleine and Nancy (right) say "Howdy." Though she hasn't made a picture in some time, Nancy's right there in the spotlight with the rest of the celebs.

Lights! Cameras! First nights! They're all part of the star business

GOING PLACES

ELIZABETH ALLAN'S OFF TO THE CORONATION

"Which boat?" puzzles Liz. "I wouldn't miss a Coronation!"

"And what'll I wear when I meet British royalty?"

Now Liz is beginning to feel she's really going places.

"Darn that lock!" Howz about sitting on the bag hard?

"Well, I'm sitting pretty. Now for dear old England."

"I knew I forgot something. It would be my Oxford suit!"

HER DAY OF REST

GLORIA STUART TAKES TIME OFF TO WORK!

Gloria sets out with rake, sprinkler, and shears.

"Gardening's a cinch!" thinks the Stuart gal.

Craving variety, she starts to prune the old family tree.

Then she gets right down to earth with her trowel.

"Let's see now, should the dirt cover the bulbs or vice versa?"

Sprinkle, sprinkle, little star, you look cute as you are!

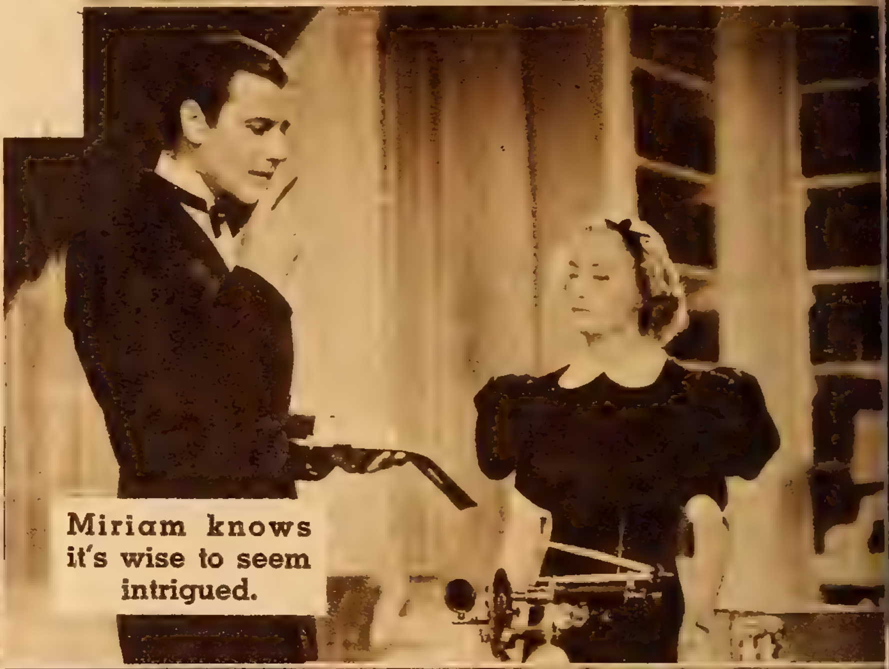
The day is done and—Gloria Stuart's done for!

WOMAN CHASES MAN!

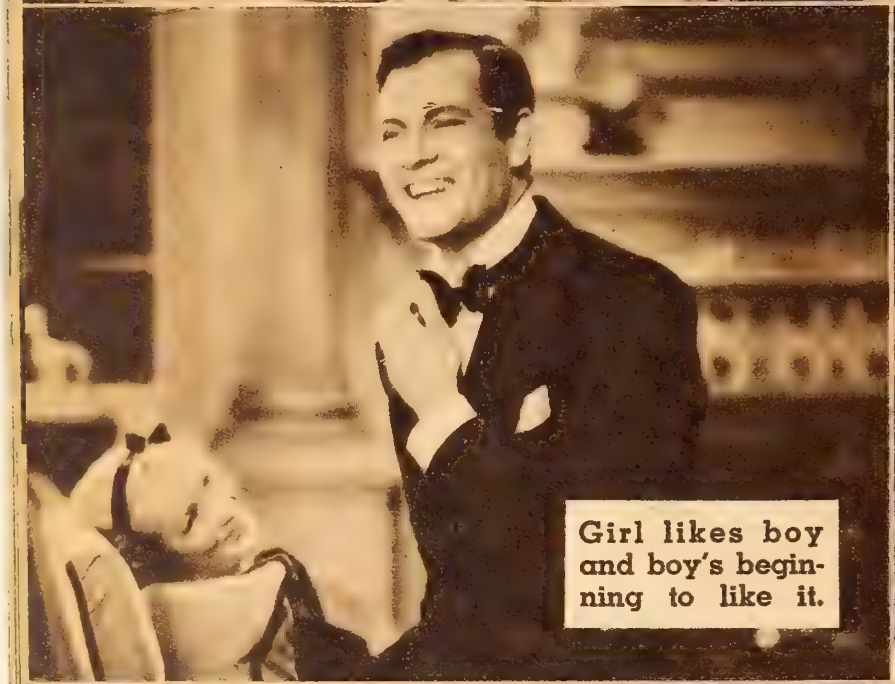
But, sh-h-h, it's only in a mad movie, starring Miriam Hopkins and Joel McCrea

Miriam has Charlie Winninger serving her already!

Joel and his gadgets make themselves at home.



Miriam knows it's wise to seem intrigued.



Girl likes boy and boy's beginning to like it.

Hmm, feining disinterest, Joel? Be careful!

A dark horse enters Miriam's marital race.

"Dear." No, "Darling!" Then what?

Olivia de Havilland hits a snag.

"Oh boy, I've got it now," she beams.

Nope—just a false alarm! "Oh, gosh!"

Inspiration has certainly set in!

"What's another word for 'love'?"

A STAR WRITES HER BEST BEAU

Olivia wisely figures that the main idea is to keep him in suspense. But suppose he's not good at guessing games? Tch, tch, what to do!

"Oh, better not! His secretary might read it."

"Well, after all, I'm an actress, not a writer."

"Of course, I can write! I haven't had time, dear."

Our Hollywood sleuth tracks

Marlene Dietrich and Doug Fairbanks, Jr., two of Hollywood's romantic people, are seen together a lot.

And here we have "Love in Bloom," featuring Virginia Bruce and David Niven, who seem to be having a gay time at the Grove.

RUSSELL PATTERSON

Best way to see Bob Taylor, if you feel you can't go on without seeing Bob Taylor, is to drop into the Beverly Brown Derby most any Saturday evening. On Saturdays, when day is done and the greasepaint is off, Bob and Barbara Stanwyck grab their favorite mounts and do a few turns on the bridle path. Later in the evening, still wearing their riding clothes, they drop into the Derby for late supper. Without the horses, of course.

■ ■ ■

More Taylor-Stanwyck Data: When they were co-starring in "This Is My Affair," it was amusing to note that Taylor was being paid $3,500 per week for romancing Barbara Stanwyck during the day—and in the evenings he did the same thing for nothing. But during the entire production, the gang at the studio commissary didn't get a peek at the screen's Number One romantic pair, for Bob and Barbara took advantage of the fact that they were working together and lunched daily in the Stanwyck dressing-room.

■ ■ ■

First time we've seen Marlene Dietrich without Doug Fairbanks, Junior, was at luncheon recently at the Brown Derby. Marlene, in one of those hats beyond the power of mere man to describe, plus furs down to here, lunched with a stranger (to us, not to her), while two tables away Fairbanks the Younger was busy telling all to a lady interviewer. The separation wasn't permanent, for they were together again at a preview that night.

■ ■ ■

When Hollywood goes for something, it goes the whole route. During the Santa Anita racing season, for instance, everyone from school kids to picture moguls placed their ready cash on the noses of their favorite steeds. One producer, a devotee of horseflesh, had a race-track handicapper as his house guest during the entire season. Every morning the guy handed the host his choices for the day. But what the producer didn't know was that his young niece copied them down each day and distributed the tips to all her pals in grade school.

Fun and frolic went on as usual at the annual Academy Award banquet, but the speech of the evening was Victor McLaglen's. As winner of last year's acting trophy, he was called upon to present the 1936 statuette to Paul Muni. Warming up to his subject, Victor went on and on, and wound up with a neat little oration on the subject of how much he'd like to win another statuette, and all the while Muni, the Academy of Motion Picture Arts, and the rest of the world waited.

So many "takes" were needed for a death scene in "Parnell," that Clark Gable became slightly bored with expiring, and each time the shot became less effective. Finally Director John Stahl hit on an idea. Instead of turning on "The Moonlight Sonata," as had been done for the other takes, he ordered "I'll Be Glad When You're Dead, You Rascal You." It is nice to report that Gable immediately died peacefully and with dispatch.

■ ■ ■

Hollywood, too, has its sit-down strikers. When Director Stahl came on the "Parnell" set one day, in a pair of trousers leaning definitely toward plaid, the cast took one look and sat themselves down firmly. "We're not going to move," announced Myrna Loy, "until that situation is changed." Poor Mr. S. had to borrow a pair of overalls from a prop man before he could get any work out of the company.

■ ■ ■

Short Story: Ever since he was first "discovered," Michael Whalen has been driving an ancient wreck of considerable vintage. Recently, with a couple of options under his belt, he drove the hack to an automobile dealer's to turn it in on a new car. While he was inside dickering, a truck sideswiped his machine and demolished it. The happy ending is that the insurance he received was twice the amount the trade-in would have brought him. Proving that wrecks sometimes pay!

■ ■ ■

Diplomacy Note: Last year, when Luise Rainer's mother arrived in Hollywood from Vienna, she was horrified at the sight of her daughter prancing about town in slacks. She told her they were undignified, and asked her to stop wearing them, but Luise paid no attention. Last month, Hubby Clifford Odets objected to the slacks, but he employed smarter tactics. He told her she was much too beautiful to go around town wearing pants. You know what happened. Luise and her slacks have parted company.

■ ■ ■

Gail Patrick was lunching at a Hollywood café when a tourist rushed up to her. "You look enough like Gail Patrick," said the visitor, "to be her sister. You ought to be in pictures." "Oh, I don't think so," said Gail. "I've tried—but nothing ever happens."

There's an amusing story around town concerning a prominent producer and his lady friend. When her birthday came around, the young lady anticipated something more or less regal in the way of a gift from her favorite gentleman. A package arrived, and she opened it to discover a charm bracelet with a single charm. With a sigh of disgust, she gave the thing to her maid. Next day the maid resigned, and a week later our young gal learned that had she opened the bracelet's charm she'd have found a $5,000 bill.

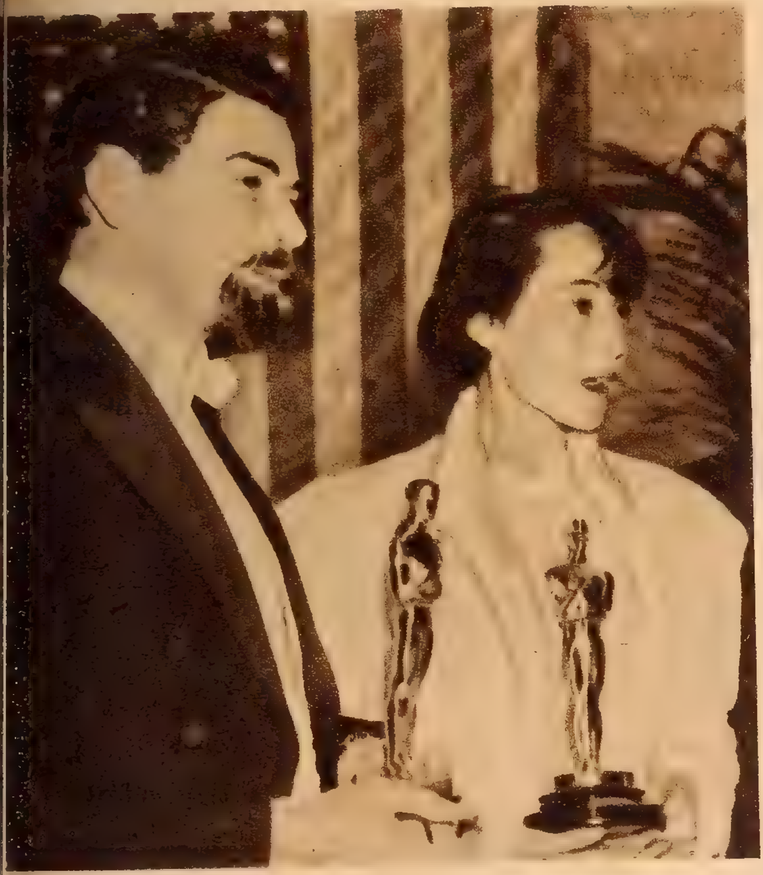
Adolphe Menjou, whose present film salary runs into the customary eight or nine million figures, began his career most inauspiciously. His net profit on his first day's work, in fact, was forty cents. It was in New York in 1914, and Adolphe the Elegant was cast as an extra in a mob



"You wouldn't kid me?" Luise Rainer may be asking. She and Paul Muni, with their trophies, at the Academy Awards dinner.

In spite of the fact that, during the shooting of "Maytime," John Barrymore had to read some of his lines from an off-scene blackboard, his studio is renewing its contract with the actor. The studio feels that the blackboard was necessitated by Barrymore's mental stress at the time, for it was during the shooting of "Maytime" that all of his marital trouble came to a head. Anyway, John is still a better actor than many a well-paid screen star—and blackboards are not expensive.

■ ■ ■

An interviewer dropped over to the "Toast of New York" set, while the picture was in production, to see Cary Grant, who co-stars with Frances Farmer and Edward Arnold. "He isn't here," a prop man told the gal. "He only works here. But if you want him you'll find him over on the 'Shall We Dance?' set." Seems there was a Miss Rogers employed there.

■ ■ ■

Cowboy star Gene Autry may be a hero to all lovers of open-air drama, but he doesn't quite make the grade in his own home town. Several months ago, Gene was scheduled for a personal appearance in his native city of Tioga, Texas. On the same day, the good citizens decided on a vote to change the name of their town to Autry. Our hero, who always arrives in the nick-of-time on the screen, was unavoidably detained, and showed up for his personal appearance several hours late. And just to prove how fleeting is fame, the good citizens counted the votes and found that the change of name had lost by three votes. So Tioga is still Tioga.

After a hard day at the studio, some gals rush to a masseuse for relaxation, and others dash to the Trocadero. But Alice Faye is different. After the day's quota of studio emoting is over, Alice goes to the privacy of her boudoir and burns incense. It's sort of a spiritual rubdown, she thinks. Maybe we'll try it some day and find out.

Affair of the month was Ginger Rogers' roller-skating party at the Culver City Rollerdrome. With Alfred Vanderbilt, she entertained the cream of Hollywood society—the first time the cream of Hollywood society had even been on skates en masse. And it was much fun, and several of our more dignified citizens spent most of the evening landing on the most undignified places. Joan Crawford probably counted more bruises than anyone. Best skater on the party was Cesar Romero.

You can tell who's who in Hollywood by attending the previews. If you're a star, the extent of your popularity is in direct proportion to the number of fans who mob you on the way out of the theatre. At the "Personal Property" preview, Bob Taylor, with Barbara Stanwyck, tried to get out the front door, but several hundred people blocked his way. Finally a studio publicity man fought his way through the throng to the Taylor car and drove it around to the theatre's back entrance. And Bob and Barbara made their getaway by the simple process of climbing down a fire-escape. Thanks for the tip, Bob. We must try that next time.

The New Cutex Evaporates Less Than Half as Much as Ordinary Polish

IN an actual test—14 days of exposure to the air—8 popular brands of nail polish evaporated 35% to 60%. Became so thick and gummy as to be practically impossible to use.

Amazing Contrast . . . But the New Cutex Polish—both Crème and Clear—came through this same test with less than half as much evaporation. Standing for 14 days in uncorked bottles, it ended up as smooth flowing and easy to apply as ever!

Cutex offers you a distinct and worth-while saving. There's practically no loss by evaporation or thickening!

And this new economy feature is just one of Cutex's many advantages. It's already famous for its finer lacquer, higher lustre, easier application and longer wear—for its freedom from peeling and chipping—and for its 11 smart shades, including 5 new "smoky" tones. A grand value, any way you look at it!

The New Cutex is still only 35¢ a bottle—Crème or Clear—at your favorite shop. Stock up today!

City State

They're on "Top of the Town"—these two gay New Yorkers of 1960! Just imagine Doris Nolan and George Murphy transplanted to the giddy night life of a city made up of glass skyscrapers. But that's part of the plot, with Gertrude Niesen at her torchiest tuning and George turning in some fancy footwork. There's a huge cast, to boot, of comedians, dancers and chorus lovelies. Lots of fun.

RECENTLY IN NEW YORK BEFORE RETURNING TO LONDON FOR THE CORONATION

THE BEAUTIFUL, YOUNG Duchess of Leinster

Tells you how she cares for her glamorously clear, smooth skin

● Delicate features in a heart-shaped face, lovely, liquid blue-gray eyes, lustrous dark-brown hair—the luminous beauty of a clear, smooth skin!

Her Grace—one of the three Premier Duchesses in the British Isles—in the white satin Court gown she will wear under her Coronation robe . . . "A treatment with Pond's Cold Cream is more than a cleansing treatment. It makes my skin feel invigorated, look brighter. I use Pond's Cold Cream night and morning and for any occasion."

● (below) Snapped on the staircase of the Crystal Garden of the Ritz-Carlton during the Duchess of Leinster's recent visit to New York.

She will stand for hours in Westminster Abbey the day of the Coronation, in a robe of velvet and ermine—jewels flashing from coronet and necklace—her lovely skin clear and luminous against its brilliant setting.

Of all the peeresses who will attend the Coronation, none will be lovelier than the slender, young Duchess of Leinster.

Admired for her beauty during her recent visit to New York, the Duchess said her beauty care is "the simplest and best —Pond's." "Pond's Cold Cream is a complete facial treatment in itself," she said. "I use it to invigorate and freshen my skin for the most important occasions."

Like hundreds of British beauties—the Duchess follows this daily method:—

Every night, smooth on Pond's Cold Cream. As it releases dirt, make-up, skin secretions—wipe them off. Now pat in more Pond's Cold Cream—briskly, till the circulation stirs. Your skin feels invigorated and freshened.

Every morning (and always before make-up) repeat . . . Your skin is smooth for powder—fresh, vital looking!

Day and night, this rousing Pond's treatment does more than clean your skin. It invigorates it . . . Fights blemishes, blackheads, lines, coarsening pores. Get a jar today. Soon see your skin growing lovelier!
